Dear Friend:

As someone who lives in a state that has passed a so-called "Right to Work" Law, you should be particularly interested in the enclosed pamphlet by Bayard Rustin, entitled "Right to Work" Laws -- A Trap for America's Minorities. This pamphlet is, I believe, an excellent documentation of the need for building Negro-white alliances and a plea for every worker to be guaranteed a job at decent wages with security and dignity.

Mr. Rustin points out, as you no doubt know, that it is no accident that among the states that have such "Right to Work" laws we find Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia and Florida. Not only are these states in which the percentage of families living in poverty is much higher than in other states, but they are also states which do not match the federal minimum wage of $1.40 an hour, states in which it is nearly impossible for Negroes to join unions, and states which do not have equal pay for women.

The pamphlet shows conclusively that the advocates of "Right to Work" laws have been opposed to every social and economic reform that would benefit Negro and white workers.

We have also enclosed a copy of the summary edition of the Freedom Budget for All Americans, a step-by-step plan for wiping out poverty in America over the next ten years.

Both booklets are available at 25¢ per copy. We want very much for people in your area to get copies of each, and will be glad to work out quantity prices and consignment orders upon request.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

A. Philip Randolph

"Right to Work" Laws

—A Trap for America's Minorities

by

Bayard Rustin

A. Philip Randolph Institute

Bayard Rustin is Executive Director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute. The subject of this pamphlet was originally delivered as a speech on the so-called Right to Work Laws on February 18, 1967. It was made in rebuttal to Reed Larson, Executive Vice-President of the National Right to Work Committee, in a debate at the annual meeting of the California Negro Leadership Conference in San Francisco.

Introduction

We in the civil rights movement have been traditionally opposed to right-to-work laws. We believe that Section 14 (b) of the Taft Hartley Act should be repealed. We have stood against these laws on the grounds not only that they destroy the unity and impair the effectiveness of labor unions, but also that they constitute an obstacle to the progress of colored Americans and are inimical to the interest of all of America's underprivileged. We recommend this pamphlet as one that sets forth clearly and, we hope, persuasively arguments against right-to-work laws.

The "Right to Work" Laws

Bayard Rustin

America is a country born in libertarianism. Its basic philosophical and constitutional documents guarantee and affirm democratic values. Yet so many millions of our people have been forced to spend their entire lives in the struggle to obtain social, political and economic justice. The Declaration of Independence, the Constitution itself, the Bill of Rights, a whole series of Federal Statutes – they articulate a course for the democratic conduct of our affairs, yet so many of us have been doomed to fight as though we are creating a democracy, instead of, in fact, inheriting a historic birthright.

Though this paradox touches in one way or another upon the lives of millions of Americans, black and white, it has been most dramatically evidenced in the lives of Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Mexican Americans and other minority groups, and in the life of the American labor movement. Nobody knows so much about American freedom as Negroes who have never really had it, whose entire journey across the stage of American history has been a long, bitter, heartbreaking journey in search of an elusive birthright. And no other social movement in America has been forced to walk as doggedly as the labor movement has, the bloody road to labor dignity and industrial democracy. Labor and minority groups have been where the real action is – the bullets, the dogs, the lynch-ropes, the billy clubs, blood dripping down through the leaves of the trees, and blood running out of the open shop. This makes us brothers not only under the skin, but also brothers in blood, in sweat, and in tears, all shed in the service of making America safe for democracy. It is to the credit of the American labor movement, and a challenge to its treatment of the Negro in the future, that I cannot make that statement about any other institution in America.

When the racists, bigots, and monopolists were not shedding our blood, they were blocking our way with all kinds of stratagems. We have heard them all – "Property Rights," "States Rights," "Right to Work." All of these slogans, as you will have noticed, and as you will still notice, have been uttered in ringing tones of idealism and individual freedom. But that is the special genius of those who would deny the right of others and hoard the fruits of democracy for themselves: They evade the problems and complex challenges of equal justice by reducing them to primitive oversimplifications that plead for nothing else but the perpetuation of their own special, exploitative interests.

The present battle being fought by some of the most powerful interests in this country to retain the so-called right-to-work laws falls squarely within the tradition of these primitive self-serving strategies. This slogan – Right to Work – developed out of the license granted by Section 14(b) of the Taft Hartley Act, is deceptive and insidious. On the face of it, what working man would not be interested in his inalienable right to work? It is only when we look more closely that we see it does not mean that at all.

IT DOES NOT MEAN that every worker has the right to a job and to receive work at fair wages, reasonable hours, and under decent labor standards.

IT DOES NOT MEAN that every worker has a right to secure employment with proper provisions for paid vacations and insurance safeguards against sickness and old age.

IT DOES NOT MEAN that every worker is protected against arbitrary discharge.

IT DOES NOT MEAN to strengthen the individual worker's bargaining position through a union of his choice.

What it means is the OPPOSITE of all these things. And what IT DOES MEAN is weakening the workers' bargaining power by keeping unions out of the factory or office.

IT DOES MEAN creating the open shop.

IT DOES MEAN destroying the institution of collective bargaining, and thus keeping Negroes and other minority members at the bottom of the economic ladder.

IT DOES MEAN wrecking the whole structure of labor union democracy and effective labor-management relations. In short, "Right to Work" is the same as Open Shop and industrial Jim Crow, and no matter how you dress it up it is the same weapon that was used to kill trade union organization in the early part of the twentieth century, the same weapon used to deny minorities their economic rights.

Therefore, Right to Work – as it becomes incumbent on Negroes and other minorities to see – beyond being aimed at wrecking the traditional labor-management apparatus, constitutes just another instrument to perpetuate the informal system of racism in the United States. That being so, I am opposed to it as a Negro; I am opposed to it as someone who sees that from this point on the problems of minorities are intimately connected with the problems of the labor movement; I am opposed to it as someone who has spent the greater part of his life in the struggle for human rights; and I am opposed to it as an American who understands that the cause of equality for all of our people and justice for all of our people cannot triumph without a strong, unified effective movement of all the workers in our society regardless of color, race and creed.

But what, in more detail, is the nature of our case against Section 14(b)? I will bring at least five charges.

1. "Right to Work" laws are a violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Anyone who examines the history and development of the Constitution will find that federal jurisdiction over national labor-management relations is vested in the "commerce clause," which argues, in effect, for a uniform regulation of commerce. The Constitutional Convention of 1787 voted unanimously to delegate to the federal government the power to regulate commerce. This is further buttressed by the provision that federal law is supreme to state law in areas delegated to the federal government. As recently as 1935, the Congress in the Wagner Act preempted for the federal government jurisdiction over labor management relations for several years, during which the Supreme Court consistently ruled that States may exercise their traditional police powers to protect public safety and order, but may not adopt their own codes of labor relations, since this was the exclusive prerogative of the federal government. The doctrine is clear, and still stands as one of the chief arbiters in relations between the federal government and the States. Significantly, there is just one exception: the authority that Section 14(b) has given the States since 1947 to exercise jurisdiction in matters affecting the local union security. There could be no more flagrant breach of one of the hallowed traditions of the Constitution, and Negroes and other ethnic minorities who have suffered most from the frustration of American constitutional guarantees cannot be happy over yet another blow to their aspirations for social and economic liberation.

President Truman, as many of us recall, had no interest in being an accomplice to this disastrous precedent. He attempted to veto the Taft Hartley Bill, sending it back to Congress with these words:

> "The bill is contrary to the national policy of economic freedom . . . would limit the freedom of employers and labor organizations to agree on methods of developing responsibility on the part of unions by establishing union security . . ."

But, as so often happens, Congress saw the issue differently. And so it overrode Truman's veto and destroyed the integrity of labor's hard-won bargaining strength.

2. "Right to Work" laws are undemocratic.

In the 1930's, slowly groping its way out of a disastrous Depression, the country made a momentous democratic political decision: We decided that henceforth free collective bargaining was to be the policy of the nation. We opted to apply democratic principles to the regulation of industrial life, and in doing so, we were also opting for "exclusive jurisdiction" in labor matters. The union that won a free and fair election among the workers in a plant was to be empowered by law to represent all the workers of that plant. The union was to become the exclusive bargaining agent that could exclude or ignore no one. This became the pattern of labor-management relationships, and it helped open the economic doors to hundreds of thousands of Negroes and other minorities. But comes 1947, and with it Section 14(b) of the Taft Hartley Act. And what does it do? It refuses to acknowledge the binding nature of the majority decision of a union membership, guarantees the right of non-union membership among workers in a plant, imposes the will of a minority of members upon the majority, and thus destroys the collective bargaining arrangement, and sets back the progress of Negroes and other minorities. But the implication of this so-called right to work law goes beyond the destruction of nationwide trade union democracy; in effect it has also given certain States a minority veto over the federal government, for it permits individual States to walk out on the national labor policy. This is a most unwise and undemocratic turn of events, with grave dangers for the enforcement of federal civil rights legislation. What would we do if individual States were permitted to disaffiliate with our national food and drugs standards? What would happen if in the United States, after every election, all the losers stopped paying taxes because they didn't like the government that was elected? What do we do when Alabama opts out of Title 6 of the Civil Rights Act? The result, needless to say, would be utter chaos and a destruction of our democracy.

3. "Right to Work" laws exploit and perpetuate American poverty.

And who, may I ask, are more concerned about poverty in the United States than Negroes and other ethnic minorities? As we have seen, most of the States that have retained these laws are the poor, segregationist, reactionary States with weak labor movements and disenfranchised Negroes, and who use the laws as an inducement to those industries with low capital and low labor incentives. In other words, they attract the kind of companies that can make money off a large, defenseless pool of unskilled labor and that can profit from the perpetuation of this backwardness. It is no accident that among these States we find Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, and Florida.

Let's look at the situation in these States:

- The percentage of families living in poverty in right-to-work States is much higher than in the other States.
- None of the right-to-work States matches the federal minimum wage of $1.40 an hour.
- In most of these States right-to-work laws make it literally impossible for Negroes to join unions.
- Negroes are barred from enjoying an expanded minimum wage in these States.
- Eleven of the States have no minimum wage standard at all.
- Only three of them have equal pay for women.
- Only one of these States has fair employment laws.

By contrast, it is significant that none of these problems exist in States with democratically organized union structures. Twenty-three of the States without "Right to Work" laws do have enforceable minimum wage laws. Fourteen of them cover men as well as women. Twenty-one provide at least $1.00 an hour minimum wage. And twelve of them equal or exceed the federal minimum wage of $1.40 an hour. And in all of them Negroes are organized in the union shop structure.

So, as the evidence shows, contrary to guaranteeing the right to work, what these laws do is to guarantee the right to work long hours; the right to bar Negroes; the right to underpay women who do equal work with men; the right to pay substandard wages; the right to pay substandard unemployment and compensation benefits; and the right to destroy organized unionism.

4. "Right to Work" laws are anti-Negro and anti-Civil Rights.

It does not require an extraordinary amount of wisdom to see that behind the insistence of certain States to maintain "Right to Work" laws is a desire to preserve their right to discriminate. In the same way that many of them have run out on the national labor policy, they want to make it easy for Mississippi and Alabama, say, to contract out of the national Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965. Therefore, it is not an accident that we find the plight of Negroes worst in States that have "Right to Work" laws. In a study conducted by Dr. Vivian Henderson, President of Clark College, Atlanta, Georgia, of Negro employment and income between 1950 and 1960, the author found that in only one of the Southern "Right to Work" States "have the earnings of the Negro male workers gained in relation to those of white male workers. In each of the other ten States, not only did the dollar gap increase, but Negroes also lost percentage ground, ranging from 6% in Virginia to 25% in Arkansas for all male workers." In short, between 1950 and 1960, everyone in these Southern States was doing better, while Negroes were falling farther and farther behind.

Therefore A. Philip Randolph is right when he says that right-to-work supporters are pushing these laws "in the hope of driving a wedge between Negroes and the labor movement." And Martin Luther King is right when he charges that the "Right to Work" laws are laws to "rob us of our civil rights and job rights." And Roy Wilkins, Clarence Mitchell, and James Farmer were absolutely right in their testimony before the Special House Subcommittee in support of the repeal of Section 14(b). As they went on to point out, it is significant that these efforts to deny our civil rights and job rights are being pushed by some of the country's staunchest segregationists.

5. "Right to Work" laws are "Rightist" and racist.

Who are some of the leading figures behind the drive to retain "Right to Work" laws? You will find their names on every right-wing letterhead across the nation, all of which organizations, let us not forget, are anti-Negro, anti-Mexican American, and anti-Puerto Rican, and anti-civil rights. These men and organizations who are representatives on the Right to Work Committee are well-known right-wingers.

What could it be that has suddenly united racists, rightists and segregationists behind the right to work? I wonder why it is that these laws were being passed in Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina and Texas during the late forties and early fifties, precisely the times when Negroes were effectively denied the right to vote? Isn't it rather cheerful and hopeful for the future of our democracy that members of the John Birch Society have suddenly developed a tender love and sympathy for the common man? If questions like these bring sneers instead of smiles to our faces, then we know we cannot take them seriously, that we are in fact being had.

In raising these questions and in relating them to the political interests and tastes of rightists and segregationists, I am not supporting the notion of guilt by association. I am against lists that would bar a man from a job on the grounds of assumptions about past membership in an organization rather than on the facts of his present competence. But in politics, it is necessary to test a man's word by what he does. And the advocates of the "Right to Work" laws have, by and large, been opposed to every social and economic reform that would benefit Negroes and workers, the very groups they sometimes profess so much concern about. It is also necessary, in politics, to judge movements by the major trends within them. And I am suspicious of any campaign in behalf of the right to work which claims to be for Negro rights, but is in fact supported by practically every racist in the country; which says it is in favor of workers' rights, yet only succeeds in States where workers are a small minority.

Though all the foregoing do not exhaust the possible objections to "Right to Work" laws, or the reason why 14(b) ought to be repealed, they represent the fundamental grounds of protest on which the labor and Negro movement stand united.

Having said all this, let me make it clear that I remain in favor of our working out a genuine right to work situation. But it is impossible to come to what such a situation would be without stating that a genuine right to work will not be achieved until the Negro and the trade union movement succeed in eliminating some of the urgent problems that remain between them. I mean by this that we all have to recognize that there is still discrimination in a minority segment of the American labor movement. This is a scandal, however, that is being vigorously fought by every unionist, black or white, who is worthy of the name. I myself am, in my own capacity, committed to end the vestiges of discrimination in the trade union movement, but I absolutely refuse to conduct the battle along lines that will ultimately injure the labor movement. I could not do this and still remain convinced that Negroes have a need and a responsibility to make that movement stronger and more effective.

After all, we must recognize that a great measure of the Negroes' economic progress is the result of their membership in the labor movement. We all know of the post World War I emigration of Southern Negroes to Northern industrial centers in search of jobs and dignity. We all know what they discovered when they came; that the economy was systematically arranged to keep them more unemployed, more menially employed, less paid, most slowly hired, and most quickly fired. We all know how that terrible disillusionment found expression in the back-to-Africa movement led by Marcus Garvey, in much the same way that their contemporary despair is finding outlet in the cries for Black Power. And we all know how the Depression that brought down millions of white Americans in poverty ironically raised the economic standards of the majority of poor Negroes who found that their relief payments added up to more than they were able to earn as workers.

It was in this period – the great Depression – that Negroes in large numbers really became involved in the labor movement. The AFL and CIO unions organized Negroes in many industrial areas, making the labor movement one of the most integrated institutions of our society. There are many problems that remain to be solved between labor and Negro; however, we are pressing a vigorous attack upon these problems. I myself am engaged in an effort to get Negro and Puerto Rican youngsters admitted to the building trades. And we have succeeded in placing 250 youngsters in those trades in the New York area. When I urge an alliance between the labor movement and other minority groups, I am not encouraging complacency nor losing sight of the unfinished business. I simply want to place the relation of the black worker to the white worker in proper perspective. More than that, it is to help us to confront together a new injustice: What are the millions of impoverished Negroes and the millions of impoverished whites going to do in an age of automation? How can we, in the new developing circumstances, guarantee full employment, and therefore guarantee a genuine right to work? The only way to guarantee this kind of right to work is for Negroes and the unions to work together. We cannot do it by ourselves, and the economy cannot do it without us. We both have got to weld a great coalition to solve the problems of jobs, education, housing. We have got to make our movement come to represent the majority will of the American society and help it move on to massive and planned social investments to end slums, inferior schools, and depression rates of employment.

It is only when we have achieved all this that we will have achieved the genuine right to work. In closing, then, I am in favor of the right to work in the sense that Franklin Roosevelt was: namely, that this society should guarantee every worker a job at decent wages with security and dignity; and if the private sector does not fulfill this task, then it must be the automatic, legal obligation of the public sector to do so.

The A. Philip Randolph Institute Has:

■ Submitted and published testimony on behalf of the $2.00 minimum wage, Extended Unemployment Benefits and Repeal of the "Right to Work" Laws.

■ Conducted workshops for students going into the South to work on voter registration, community organization, and political education.

Are Policemen Enemies of the Poor? ---Not So and 5 Officers Show Why

By FRANK WELLS

"Man, you don't have to look for poverty around here. Just step out the door and it hits you right in the face."

Atlanta Police Officer V. E. Jackson was talking in the Economic Opportunity Atlanta, Inc., neighborhood office on Georgia Avenue.

First in a series.

Why is a police officer so much interested in poverty?

Poverty breeds crime — and the Atlanta Police department is engaged in a brand new project: that of crime prevention through a new bureau.

Five police officers are assigned and work each day in five of the EOA's neighborhood offices. They are trying—and succeeding — to change the image of the Atlanta cop from that man in blue who means trouble when he shows up to that of the man in blue who is there to help — and keep the trouble from happening.

The men work under the supervision of Lt. Howard Baugh, Atlanta's highest ranking Negro police officer.

"The first attitude that we had to change was that of the police officer himself," said Lt. Baugh. "We have been in these neighborhoods many times. . . . They know us. . . . And when we were here before it was for the purpose of an arrest.

"We didn't seek causes for why a man had committed a crime. We just arrested him. If he did wrong, he got in jail. Now we are trying—in these same neighborhoods—to find out why someone commits a crime and correct that situation before it leads to the ultimate conclusion of robbery or theft or selling liquor or any of the many crimes that still plague the city."

Lt. Baugh has been a tough cop—tough on the criminal element and tough on the men under him, making each toe the line.

He is still a tough cop—all six feet, 200 pounds of him.

But this toughness, this energy, is now channeled into the hard fight for crime prevention.

Lt. Baugh said that the next problem he and his men have is to be able to get close to and talk to the potential law-breaker —particularly the teen-age boys, in and out of school.

"Before we started this programe (Jan. 3 of this year), the closest many of these boys had been to a police officer was 'spotting distance.' They would run any time a policeman showed up, whether they had done anything wrong or not," Lt. Baugh said.

He laid the cause of this attitude on the kids' association with others who had run afoul the law and on parents who frighten children into good behavior by threatening them with calling a policeman.

"We've gone into day nurseries — little bitty kids — and they would shrink away and tighten up at the sight of the blue uniform. We've made friends with them, and they've gone home with the wonderful news to their parents: 'Mama, today I TOUCHED a policeman!'

"It makes you heartsick . . . But we are doing something about it," Lt. Baugh said.

The Crime Prevention Bureau, which operates under the overall direction of Capt. M. G. Redding, recommended last fall by the Atlanta Commission on Crime and Juvenile Delinquency. Chief Herbert Jenkins started the new approach immediately.

There was a field in which to work . . . and the logical cooperative effort lay with Economic Opportunity Atlanta's neighborhood offices.

Police officers have assigned to five of these centers. Officer H. L. Bolton is at Nash-Washington center, J. P. Arnold at Price High School center, A. L. Cardell at Central City (Techwood) center, A. A. Harris at Perry Homes center and V. E. Jackson at Summerhill - Mechanicsville center. All of the officers are Negroes.

The program is so new that there are no precedents anywhere in the country where advice could be sought. San Francisco has a Crime Prevention Bureau, but it doesn't operate in the same manner. Atlanta's bureau—and its problems—are unique.

There are problems. There will be errors. But progress is being made.

Good Example of Crime Prevention: Officer Helps Boys at Perry Homes

By FRANK WELLS

Atlanta Police Lt. Howard Baugh slowed the unmarked police car as it approached a gang of seven or eight Negro teen-age boys on a corner near Archer High School.

The group exploded like a covey of quail and the boys went running at full tilt toward the sanctuary of Archer High. It was during school hours, and they all ran into the building.

"Well," sighed Lt. Baugh, "there's the best example I know of why we need a Crime Prevention Bureau. I didn't think those boys had done anything wrong—maybe being out of school when they shouldn't be—but they weren't going to hang around to have me ask any questions."

"How did they know you were a cop?" I asked Lt. Baugh. "The car isn't marked. You are in civilian clothes."

"They can recognize a police car—unmarked—just as far as they can see it. And they can recognize any law enforcement officer just as far," Lt. Baugh said.

"How old are they when they develop this talent?"

"When they are four or five . . ." and Lt. Baugh's normally merry-looking round face took on a cast of sadness. "That's what we are trying to overcome."

We drove into an area of modern-looking, brick buildings—the Perry Homes.

"And this HAS been a jungle," Lt. Baugh said. "There are kids here who can strip a car even after they've heard the cops are driving into the other side of the homes."

About 1,000 families live in the Perry Homes. "I believe just a small percentage of these folks are really bad," Lt. Baugh said. "The rest are just good — but scared — folks who in the past wouldn't cooperate with the police out of fear."

But in just two short months, Officer A. A. Harris, working with Economic Opportunity Atlanta officials, has managed to reach some of the really "tough" teen-agers and young men in Perry Homes.

He has, with the help of EOA's recreation director John Davis, set up two Police Athletic Leagues: one for the youngsters still in high school and one for the dropouts. There are at present just 55 members—but they are key leaders among the youths in Perry and Bowen Homes.

Four boys dropped into Officer Harris' cramped office in the Perry Homes.

They talked about basketball and were obviously on friendly terms with the policeman.

Later the discussion came back to these four:

"They were some of the really tough guys here," Officer Harris said, and Lt. Baugh nodded his agreement. "The two brothers had been rejected by their family — a stepfather, really — because they weren't bringing in any money. They dropped out of school and just went sort of wild."

Harris explained that he had finally managed to talk to the boys and got them and some of their buddies who were also leaders of "gangs" to help set up an athletic program.

Perry Homes houses 1,000 families—but there is no recreation center or community center there. Officer Harris had to talk the principals of schools into making recreational facilities available after school hours for the boys.

The program is working. The boys, in their meetings, have set up rules—and one of them is to cooperate with the police (Officer Harris) in their work toward crime prevention.

"This is no informers' league," Officer Harris said. "They make their own rules. They fined me fifty cents for talking out of turn at one of their meetings. I paid.

"But we found out about kids buying cough syrup with codeine in it, buying glue for sniffing, and we were able to stop this kind of sale in the neighborhood stores.

"These boys have found out—and their influence is growing—that life is more rewarding on the right side of the law."

JOB CORPS HELP

The Job Corps has given some of these youths an opportunity to continue their education and make a little money for their families at the same time.

What about the adults?

"You just have to keep trying . . . " Lt. Baugh said to Officer V. E. Jackson at the EOA office on Georgia Avenue in the middle of the Summerhill-Mechanicsville district.

Officer Jackson had just told of the man with nine children who wanted to go straight but had a police record "as long as your arm."

WANTS TO WORK

"Every job he gets or tries to get, they find out about his record and fire him," Officer Jackson said. "I can't do anything about his record. . . . I don't know if I'd want to hire him. But the man wants to work and go straight."

"You've got to keep trying," Lt. Baugh said. "Trying and trying and trying. . . . You can't just close the record on this fellow. There must be some sort of menial labor or something that he can do. You just keep trying."

These fellows won't quit. They won't win them all, but as Lt. Baugh says, "We'll keep trying."

'Thinking' Police Making Prevention Bureau Work

POLICE AC 3/5/66

By FRANK WELLS

Atlanta's Crime Prevention Bureau—manned by experienced policemen—is new. It was set up Jan. 3 after recommendations by the Atlanta Commission on Crime and Juvenile Delinquency.

Police Chief Herbert Jenkins was at first dubious about getting into a field that he felt belonged to various welfare and rehabilitation agencies.

Last of a Series

"But when the commission made its recommendation, we set it up, and I put the best men I could think of to run it: Capt. (M.G.) Redding and Lt. (Howard) Baugh.

"They are both 'thinking' as well as 'acting' police officers—and they are getting results."

The process is slow, it is new. There will be errors, as Chief Jenkins pointed out, because there is no precedent. Every case is a new one. This new way of policing hasn't been done before.

"I don't know what we would do without officer (V. E.) Jackson," said Mrs. Edith A. Hambrick, social services supervisor of Economic Opportunity Atlanta's office in the Summerhill-Mechanicsville district.

"He has gotten to know these people and he goes with the workers sometimes when they have to call on a difficult-case family. It helps a lot. He brings in many people who need help to keep them away from crime.

"We are not a money-handout agency. We are here to help people help themselves — and Officer Harris is helping us do just that."

In Perry Homes, EOA recreation director John Davis talked about the work Officer A. A. Harris has done there.

"He's the one who has made these athletic leagues work. I know that the kids are going to name the league after him. He didn't know that before now . . .

'Thinking' Police Get the Job Done

But that's how much they think of him," Davis said.

Some city officials feel that the Police department has no place in such a "social service" field. But the police are—next to the criminals themselves—the ones who know the criminals best, and what makes them criminals.

Much of the "public relations" work being done by the Crime Prevention Bureau has been done before on an unofficial scale by the policemen and police women who work with juveniles and the schools. The new bureau gives emphasis to the genuine humanitarian feelings of most policemen.

But will it really work? Will it really cut down on crime?

Nobody knows . . . yet. It seems to be working in the relatively small areas where it is being tried. If these are successful, the bureau probably will grow, and its efforts may perhaps affect the crime rate.

As Mrs. S. F. Crank, director of the EOA center in the poverty-ridden area of Summerhill, said: "We can't stamp out poverty or crime altogether. We know that. We can just try, and keep on trying."

Improving Respect for Law

Compared with those in other Southern cities, Atlanta's police and its courts are notably free of overt racial discrimination. The force and the court facilities are integrated. Police Chief Jenkins has clearly and repeatedly pronounced segregation dead. There are many dedicated men among police and court personnel.

Yet no one can observe police at work or the municipal court in action without realizing that as a general rule, the treatment of Negroes—and poor white people—is different from the treatment of the white majority.

Negroes are patronized in court and treated heavy-handedly by the cop on the beat. This sounds unduly harsh, but the facts are observable.

This is not merely an Atlanta problem, nor a Southern problem. One of the explosive factors behind the Watts riots was a feeling among Watts Negroes that Los Angeles police had dual standards of justice. Justified or otherwise, Negroes in most of the major urban cities of the North have made similar complaints.

A standard defense of police against allegations of rights-violations is: "What about the rights of police not to be cut, shot and beat up? What about the rights of the community to enforce the law?"

Law enforcement men have tough jobs. There's no doubt about that. They risk life and limb daily. They do have to deal with a lot of tough customers. And in moments of danger, they naturally protect themselves first and think of constitutional rights later.

But too many fall into the attitude that because most of their trouble is with the poor, the poor are all trouble-makers who have to be shoved around if they are to be kept in line.

But if the protections of the Constitution are to mean anything, they must apply to the weak as well as the mighty, the poor and ignorant as well as the affluent, educated majority. Furthermore, the less respect police have in a community, the harder their job of law enforcement. Maltreatment of Negroes only exacerbates the task of policing in the Negro community.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia, after lengthy documentation of alleged mistreatment, and of Negro community attitudes toward police, has called for an independent civilian review board to hear future accusations against police.

Police throughout the country oppose such boards. We are aware that civilian review carries with it the danger of political grandstanding and of endangering police morale. Yet a review board would be at least one way of redressing a serious grievance, and we have yet to hear a practical alternative.

In any case, the chairman of the aldermanic police committee, Richard Freeman, displayed more temper than judgment when he said: "If the ACLU has anything to do with it, then I don't want to be associated with it." Ditto Chief Jenkins' remark that he didn't care what ACLU said.

Thumbing their noses at the ACLU won't run the problem away.

Mrs. Wallace Files; Admits He's Running

2/25/66 Ark. Gazette

From Gazette Press Services

MONTGOMERY, Ala.—Governor George C. Wallace announced Thursday that his wife, Lurleen, 39, a girlish blonde, would run to succeed him.

"If my wife is elected, we are frank and honest to say that I shall be by her side and shall make the policies and decisions affecting the next administration."

Mrs. Wallace was equally frank. "My election would enable my husband to carry on his programs for the people of Alabama," she said.

Reading smoothly from a prepared statement, the one-time dime store clerk said, "I want to provide the people of Alabama an opportunity to reaffirm their support for the principles of free enterprise and local government and for the principles of honesty and integrity in government."

"Let me say it this way," Mrs. Wallace said, "if I am elected governor, there would not be any change from what we have now."

Wallace, standing at his wife's side, predicted to the hundreds of placard-waving followers that "Mrs. Wallace will win." He promised at the same time that "not a single dime of state funds or facilities [including cars and planes] will be used" in the campaign.

Wallace told the crowd that the campaign will be a test of his own popularity and that he

Flowers Joins Alabama Race For Governorship Nomination

State Attorney General, Foe of Segregation, Will Oppose Mrs. Wallace in Primary

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Feb. 25—Attorney General Richmond M. Flowers, once a college friend and now a bitter foe of Gov. George C. Wallace, announced today that he would seek the Democratic nomination for Governor of Alabama.

He paid a $500 filing fee to qualify him to run in the primary May 3.

Mr. Flowers made an immediate gibe at the Governor and his segregationist supporters by pledging to fly the American Flag from the dome of the State Capitol.

Only the flags of Alabama and the Confederacy fly there now. The American Flag can be seen on a pole at one side of the building.

"This is no act of reason," Mr. Flowers said at a brief press conference in his office. "This is a gesture of defiance that must be put behind us. I intend that such gestures become a part of our past."

"I am a man of reason," Mr. Flowers said. "This is a serious time for our state. We face a critical election—the choice of a Governor who must lead and not divide, who must command the respect of all reasonable men and women in Alabama."

Yesterday, Governor Wallace announced that he would attempt to keep his hold on the state government by running his wife, Lurleen, for Governor. The State Constitution prohibits him from succeeding himself after one four-year term.

Mr. Flowers and Mr. Wallace were friends and, until the race issue separated them, held similar political views.

They were in law school together at the University of Alabama just before World War II. Mr. Flowers broke with his fraternity brothers and supported Mr. Wallace, a struggling youth from a poor family, in an unsuccessful race for president of the student body.

Both men later served as legislative floor leaders for one of Alabama's most liberal Governors, James E. Folsom.

Their differences date from Jan. 16, 1963, when Mr. Wallace became Governor and Mr. Flowers Attorney General. Mr. Wallace, in his inaugural address, defied the Federal Government on school integration. Mr. Flowers asserted that defiance "can bring nothing but disgrace to our state."

Mr. Flowers, who is considered a progressive on other issues has consistently opposed the Governor's segregationist policies since then. As a result, he is expected to get a large share of the growing Negro vote, which may number 200,000 out of a total vote of 600,000 to 800,000. Alabama had about 115,000 registered Negroes before the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 went into effect.

He is not expected to attract many white voters and he is not given much chance of winning the election.

Mr. Flowers, 47 years old, has been called a new style of populist. Unlike the famous Southern populists of the past, he is not a poor man. He is one of four sons of the late John Jefferson Flowers Sr., founder of the Bank of Dothan in Southeast Alabama.

Mr. Flowers was the 10th candidate to qualify for the Democratic primary. Other candidates include former Gov. John Patterson, who defeated Mr. Wallace in his first try for the governorship in 1958, and former United States Representative Carl Elliott.

12 Negroes Seek Seats in Alabama

AJ - 3/2/66

By REX THOMAS

JASPER, Ala. (AP) — Voters in a dozen Alabama counties will find a record number of Negro candidates on the ballot in the upcoming Democratic primary, and some of them stand at least an even chance of defeating their white opponents.

At the qualifying deadline at midnight Tuesday night 12 Negroes were seeking seats in the legislature and more than a score of others were running for county or party office in the May 3 election.

Before the time limit expired for candidates to get their names on the ballot, a retired office worker plunged unexpectedly into the already crowded race for governor. One of the two women seeking the Democratic gubernatorial nomination withdrew, asking for her money back.

The new candidate for governor was Eunice I. Gore, a 46-year-old Leeds resident, who described himself as a "God-fearing man" doing the will of God in running for the office.

Five minutes before the deadline, Ralph (Shorty) Price announced that his wife, Dolores, was withdrawing as a candidate for governor. He said she based her decision on the belief that "no woman can be elected," and added: "So, I want my $500 back." He got it.

The other woman in the governor's race is Lurleen Wallace, wife of Gov. George C. Wallace.

A Huntsville attorney, John A. Reynolds, 45, got into the lieutenant governor's race with no advance notice.

The only three Democrats in the Alabama congressional delegation got by without opposition and automatically won renomination since no write-in votes are permitted in the Democratic primary.

They are Reps. George Andrews of the 3rd District, Armistead Selden of the 5th District and Robert E. (Bob) Jones in the 8th District.

The other five Alabama House seats are held now by Republicans. Two or more Democrats are running in each district in quest of the right to get on the general election ballot against certain GOP opposition in a state where Democratic nomination once was equivalent to election.

One of the Negroes who got into the primary in the closing hours was Rev. P. H. Lewis, pastor of the Negro church in Selma where the civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery began last year. He is running for a seat in the legislature against a white incumbent, Rep. Val Hain.

Another Negro, Bessemer attorney David H. Hood Jr., joined three other members of his race who had qualified earlier as candidates for the House from Jefferson County (Birmingham).

Negro candidates are running for House seats also in three other districts embracing eight counties. Another Negro is a candidate for the State Senate in a four-county district.

In the district which includes Macon, Barbour and Bullock counties, Negroes have a voting majority. In the others, except for Mobile and Jefferson counties, they may have enough votes by election day to nominate candidates of their race.

Negro candidates are running for sheriff in three counties — Macon, Wilcox and Perry — where there are more Negro voters than white. They also are opposing white candidates for other county or party office in those counties and in Barbour, Montgomery and Mobile.

Alabama's Negroes Seek Office

AC 3/3/66
POLITICS

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) — Negroes, exercising their newly found political muscles, are running for office in the Democratic primary in at least 18 Alabama counties.

But in one of the primary target areas of the recent civil rights campaign, Lowndes County, they are bypassing the primary in favor of a third party ticket under the emblem of the Black Panther.

Democratic party officials in Lowndes, anticipating that Negroes might run in the party election May 3, raised the qualifying fees for some offices from $50 to $500 and for others from $10 to $100.

Twelve Negro candidates are running for Democratic nomination for the legislature in House or Senate districts embracing 13 counties. Voters in 10 of those counties will chose also between white and Negro contenders for local or party office.

And in four other counties, Negroes are running only for countywide office outside the legislature.

Sheriffs throughout the state come up for re-election this year, and Negroes are seeking that office in five other counties —Greene, Hale, Macon, Perry and Wilcox. They outnumber white voters in all five counties.

Democratic Lists Show Bid for Control of Black Belt

POLITICS

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 2—Alabama Negroes, many of them barred from even voting a year ago, are seeking elective offices in every county in which their race is in the majority.

The magnitude of their attempt to wrest the state's 11-county "Black Belt" from white political dominance became known today when county probate judges issued the names of Democratic primary candidates who qualified before the midnight filing deadline yesterday.

The list showed Negores running for at least 33 offices, including sheriff and state legislator, in the Black Belt, or well over half the offices up for election in the region this year.

The lists were limited to Democratic candidates and thus did not include possible Republican candidates. It also did not include Lowndes County Negroes who are bypassing the Democratic primary to run as candidates of the Lowndes County Freedom Organization, an all-Negro political party that has adopted the black panther as its symbol.

In addition to the Black Belt drives, Negroes have qualified as candidates in at least six counties where whites are in the majority.

Negroes are also attempting to elect a state senator from a district that embraces Monroe County. That county is predominantly Negro but is not counted as part of the state's Black Belt, a designation that applies to the color of the county's soil as well as to its population.

The Negro candidates plunged into the race as a direct result of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which thus far has added approximately 100,000 Negroes to the voting rolls in Alabama, compared with about 90,000 a year ago.

In Wilcox County, for example, there were no registered Negro voters a year ago, but Negroes now outnumber whites on the rolls and are attempting to elect a sheriff, a tax assessor, two county commissioners and a state senator.

"This business of so many colored people running is really shaking the people up," said one probate judge from a predominantly Negro county. "I don't like it either, but don't quote me by name. I'm up for election in 1970, and I'll have to have votes from both sides if I'm going to win."

Albert Turner, state director of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference and a candidate for the State House of Representatives from a predominantly Negro district, said his organization "could have gotten a good many more candidates to run" but decided against seeking every office.

"We didn't want it to look like we were completely trying to take over," he said. "We want integrated government, not all-Negro government."

Some Favor Coalition

Negro candidates are after the sheriff's office and a majority of seats on the County Board of Revenue and three other major offices in Macon County, the home of Tuskegee Institute, but some are being opposed by Negro leaders who favor a "coalition" government with whites.

In Dallas County, which has Selma as its county seat and was the center of the Negroes' campaign for the Voting Rights Law, Negroes are running for a seat in the Legislature, tax collector and two places on the Board of Revenue, the county governing body.

But they kept out of the sheriff's race to support Selma's Public Safety Director, Wilson Baker, in his effort to oust Sheriff James G. Clark, one of the South's most militant segregationistsr.

In all, Negroes were in five sheriff's races and at least 12 legislative races, in additions to the campaigns for other offices.

They are predicting victory in approximately half the races. In 50 per cent of the Black Belt counties, Negro voter registration drives have lagged, and whites say they still have a majority of the voters.

In the South '66 May Be a Big Year for G.O.P.

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 5—If Alabama's political reporters had been invited to a strategy session called by a handful of the state's young Republicans in late 1960, few would have bothered to take out their pencils.

In the context of the times, almost any disinterested observer would have been forced to conclude that the would-be politicians—lawyers, businessmen and a dentist—were not laying political plans. They were daydreaming.

Richard Nixon, the party Presidential candidate, had just lost the state by 86,000 votes and the party had failed to win a single seat in the State Legislature. Yet, the "strategists" were drawing up a timetable which, they said, would place a Republican in the Governor's Mansion and scores of party members in city and county offices and in the Legislature in 1966.

Only one thing, the young strategists reasoned in that meeting in 1960, could upset their plans: The nomination of New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller as the party's 1964 Presidential candidate. They regarded him as "too liberal" on both the segregation-integration issue and economics to be "sold" in the South.

Barry Goldwater, of course, and not Mr. Rockefeller, won the nomination. And Republicans, capitalizing in the Deep South on Mr. Goldwater's opposition to the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and on a painstaking build-up of party strength in other Southern states, sent 16 party members to the U.S. House of Representatives from the 11 states of the Confederacy.

In the aftermath of the election, two South Carolina Democrats switched party affiliation. Representative Albert Watson became the 17th Republican House member (out of 105 Southern Representatives) and Senator Strom Thurmond joined Senator John Tower to form a two-man Senatorial delegation from the South.

Buoyed by their party's upsurge in the once solidly Democratic South, Republicans in Georgia are now talking of making their first major assault on the statehouse by attempting to persuade their new Republican Congressman, Howard H. Callaway, to run for Governor. In Mississippi, Republican Representative Prentiss Walker is already campaigning against James O. Eastland for the U.S. Senate. Senators Thurmond of South Carolina and Tower of Texas are expected to seek re-election. In Arkansas, Winthrop Rockefeller, brother of the New York Governor, is trying for a second time to unseat Gov. Orval Faubus.

With the November elections still eight months away most political slates are still incomplete. However, it is clear that in almost every state the list of Republican candidates will be longer and stronger than in any election since Reconstruction.

But it is in Alabama that Republicans have their best chance of forging a political force that extends from the courthoue to the statehouse to Washington.

The audacious Republican timetable of 1960, which finally was published in 1963 amid Democratic chuckles, now seems an uncanny piece of political forecasting.

In their 160 meeting, the young Republican strategists agreed that the first step in their timetable was to toss out the "old guard" Republican leadership and install the chairman of the strategy committee—John Grenier, then a 30-year-old Birmingham attorney—as chairman of the state party. Then they would wage an all-out campaign in 1962, trying to elect either a Senator or a Governor, but not really expecting to win.

In 1963 and early 1964, they would attempt to put $150,000 into a nonexistent party treasury. In In 1964, they would elect "at least one—and possibly three or four—Congressmen."

Growing Optimism

All the while, they would be developing candidates and building party enthusiasm with the 1966 election in mind. That November, they would seek every statewide office, Congressional seat, and a majority of the legislative seats and local offices. They expected to win most of the races.

Eighteen months later, they met the first step in their timetable. Mr. Grenier was elected state chairman. In the fall of 1962, a revamped state party came within 6,800 votes of electing James Martin, a little-know Gadsden oil distributor who repeatedly accused incumbent Lister Hill of dragging his feat in the fight against integration, to the U.S. Senate.

The "new" Republicans raised $300,000, rather than $150,000, over the next two years by soliciting conservative businessmen in the urban areas which had been voting Republican in national elections and Democratic in state races since 1952. Then in 1964, by riding the crest of a Goldwater landslide, they exceeded their own expectations in the Congressional races. Republicans—including Mr. Martin, this year's gubernatorial candidate—won five of eight House seats.

This week, thoroughly convinced of the party's strength, many of the state's professional and amateur political analysts rated the party as the favorite in the Governor's race, most Congressional races, and dozens of local and legislative campaigns.

A half-dozen recent defections by Democratic legislators and party officials, plus the five Republican Congressmen, had given Alabama Republicans what many other state parties lacked—a list of "name" candidates.

In addition, the organizational effort launched in 1960 seemed to assure the party of candidates in 85 per cent of the legislative races and many of the races for courthouse and city hall offices.

The campaign for candidates has been made easier by Democratic leaders who have brought their party's name into disrepute in the state by repeatedly assailing national Democratic policies.

But by gaining segregationist and conservative support, the Alabama Republicans—like most Republican parties in the South—are running the risk of alienating the steadily increasing Negro vote.

However, if Alabama Democrats nominate Lurleen Wallace, the wife of the state's militantly segregationist Governor, as their gubernatorial candidate, the Republican racial dilemma may be solved.

Against Mrs. Wallace, the party could expect Negro and conservative votes, plus the votes of segregationists who rebel at the idea of a woman Governor.

THE NEW YORK TIMES,

'Bloody Sunday' Was Year Ago; Now Selma Negroes Are Hopeful

POLITICS

By ROY REED 3/6/66

Special to The New York Times

SELMA, Ala., March 5—No one here has forgotten March 7, 1965, when the buttercups and tulip trees were fouled with tear gas. The Negroes still call it "Bloody Sunday."

But there is a new air in Selma this March. Almost 11,000 Negroes in Dallas County are registered to vote, for the first time, in this spring's election. Because of that, this black-belt county is turning toward moderation, as Tuskegee and other such places have turned away from political extremism when all white rule was abolished.

The Negroes have one score to settle before they let Selma slip quietly into the American blend of moderation. They are determined to put Sheriff Jim Clark out of office.

To get him out, it seems likely that they will team up with Wilson Baker, one white leader who kept the Negroes' constant, if grudging, respect all through the civil rights turbulence last year. Mr. Baker, who recently resigned as public safety director of Selma to enter politics, is Sheriff Clark's opponent in the Democratic primary on May 3.

Things to Remember

It was Sheriff James G. Clark Jr., and his men who used cattel prods and night sticks on the Negroes, who marched their children into the countryside until they were exhausted after they had gone to the Court House to demonstrate and who jailed thousands of Negroes for marching to the voter registration system.

And it was Jim Clark and his men who joined the state highway patrol to stop 525 Negroes from marching to Montgomery one year ago Monday. The officers tear gased the marchers and clubbed them and herded them back across Pettus bridge with horses. When the terror subsided, 17 persons were in hospital and 50 had been treated for minor injuries.

That day's event led directly to the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Not more than 300 Negroes were registered here a year ago. Almost 9,500 whites were on the voting books.

Now the whites have about 12,000 registered and the Negroes nearly 11,000. Exact figures are not available. The Negroes, slightly more than half of the county's population, are expected to overtake the whites in registration before the generel election in November.

Another segregationist officeholder threatened by the new political force is State Senator Walter Givhan, the dean of the Alabama Senate and a longtime segregationist leader.

A year ago, Senator Givhan was safe. Now, because of Negro registration and legislative reapportionment that expanded his district to take in two nearby counties, the Senator is in danger of being unseated by David Ellwanger, a young white liberal.

Mr. Ellwanger is a brother of the Rev. Joseph Ellwanger of Birmingham, who led a group of white integrationists in a demonstration of sympathy with the Negroes here last spring.

Five Negroes are running for lesser Dallas County offices. They have little chance of winning, but their candidacies demonstrate that the Negroes must be reckoned with from now on.

The Rev. P. H. Lewis, pastor of Brown's Chapel A. M. E. Church, the scene of the nightly mass meetings during the civil rights upheaval, is running for the State House of Representatives. He said he had noticed changes in the whites' attitudes already.

"They put 'Mr.' and 'Mrs.' on your letters now," he said "They used to call me 'P.H.' Now it's 'Reverend Lewis.' That might not seem like much in Chicago and New York, but down here it's important."

Whites Promise Help

White officeholders and candidates have begun to promise to "look out for all the the people," Mr. Lewis said.

On "Bloody Sunday," one of the women clubbed down and left gasping in the tear-gas was Mrs. Amelia P. Boynton, a civil rights leader who is a real estate and insurance agent.

Mrs. Boynton this week expressed optimism and said that Selma had improved greatly.

She and a group of friends are trying to promote a garment factory and a poultry processing plant to employ Negroes. A Negro-owned supermarket, opened here in September, is reported to be prospering.

Not all the Negroes are happy. The movement barely touched those of the rural area last year. It is just now arriving there.

"The system is not broken at all," said Miss Shirley Mesheh, a white woman who is Dallas County project director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

"The only thing the Negroes have gotten is the vote," she said.

Politics In Alabama

Politics in the Yellowhammer state has a light-opera aspect with a cast that included for a while two lovely lady candidates for the Democratic nomination for governor. A note of seriousness has been temporarily introduced. A federal court has ordered an end to the poll tax, describing it accurately as a device calculated to deter the Negro citizen in the right to select those who will govern him. (It also deprived a large number of white citizens who had bread and butter needs that were more immediate and pressing than a poll tax receipt.) Appeals will perhaps delay application of the tax. Its passing will, in good time, however, spur the registration of additional voters.

In the months since passage of the federal voting bill, Alabama's registered Negroes have increased from about 115,000 to about 200,000. More are being added daily. The chore of bringing citizens to the registration books is not glamorous. It is tiring shoe-leather-and-leg work.

Door-to-Door

Some of the activist civil rights groups while, of course, endorsing voter registration still have avoided participating in the door-to-door campaign that is necessary to educate many eligible persons to their eligibility and to the duty of registering. The gains, therefore, are spotty. But they continue and will increase as work and education reach the unregistered.

Some of the activist civil rights groups while, of course, endorsing voter registration still have avoided participating in the door-to-door campaign that is necessary to educate many eligible persons to their eligibility and to the duty of registering. The gains, therefore, are spotty. But they continue and will increase as work and education reach the unregistered.

The two young charming ladies, in the order of their announcement, were Dolores Price and Lurleen Wallace. The implications were that it would be the husband who would take charge, should either of the ladies win. Feminists over the state are objecting to this. They insist that such dogmatic dismissal of the rights of any woman who might be elected governor is not good manners, especially in the region which has had so much to say for so many years about the abilities, charms, and rights of Southern womanhood.

Governor Wallace, whose wife, Lurleen, is to be one of the candidates, minced no words in his declaration that candidate Lurleen would have nothing to do with being governor if elected. "If my wife is elected," he said, "we are frank and honest to say that I will be by her side and shall make the policies and decisions. . . ."

'Little Giant'

Governor Wallace, who enjoys being called "The Little Giant," would have been, in a sense, an indirect opponent of Ralph (Shorty) Price. Mr. Price is no taller than the governor. Since he has never won a political office, he has accepted the democratic "Shorty" and leaves being little giants to others. Nor did Mr. Price so emphatically exclude his wife, Dolores, from the voicing of opinions or the making of decisions. Apparently Mr. Price was seeking the feminist vote. Sad to say, however, Dolores made a last minute decision not to run.

The dilemma of the Democrats and the Republicans in Alabama is that with one exception all candidates are segregationists working the same side of the street. James Martin, a former Democrat who broke with his party because of its civil rights plank, is now a Republican. He still opposes civil rights, if one reads his pronouncements correctly. At least two so-called Democratic legislators have announced they are now Republicans and will support him. These men, angry with the leadership of their party, ignore the fact that the Republican national civil rights platform accepts everything the Democrats have stood for. The political development of the Republican party in the South is, in general, racist. It ignores the planks of the national party.

In Alabama the GOP, mostly defecting Democrats, presently is given a slight edge. But there is hardly a dime's worth of difference in principle or outlook.

Bliss Also Vows to Name 3 Others to National Staff

3/12/66

By DAVID S. BRODER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 11—The Republican National Chairman, Ray C. Bliss, agreed today to add a Negro as a top-level staff member of the Republican National Committee.

Mr. Bliss promised a delegation of 10 Negro Republicans who met with him today to appoint a Negro special assistant and three other Negro staff members "to recruit Republican voters among the nation's Negro population."

Mr. Bliss said he would meet with the delegation again "within the next few weeks" to review applications for the jobs of special assistant, a woman deputy special assistant, and two public relations and research aides for them.

The new special assistant will, in effect, be a replacement for Clay Claiborne, who was transferred last month from his old position as head of the committee's minorities division to a new job on the staff of the public relations division.

Mr. Claiborne is awaiting trial in Atlantic City on a charge of violating the election law in 1964. The charge stems from the allegation that he ordered the printing of a pamphlet urging Negroes to write in the name of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. for President.

Mr. Clairborne, a Negro, was a member of the committee at the time of the incident.

Dr. King repudiated the effort, which the Democratic National Chairman, John M. Bailey, had described as "a desperate last-minute effort by Goldwater supporters to persuade Negro voters to waste their ballots."

It was understood that the members of the Republican Negro Advisory Committee, which met with Mr. Bliss last August and again today, had told the chairman that Mr. Claiborne's removal was necessary to reestablish Negroes' confidence in the national committee.

Committee aides said Mr. Claiborne had been out of the office, because of ill health, in recent weeks.

The Democratic National Committee has had a Negro, Louis Martin, a former Chicago publisher, as its deputy chairman since 1961.

Mr. Bliss has frequently identified increasing the Republicans' share of the Negro vote as one of his major objectives. However, he has been criticized by some party progressives for the pace of his efforts in this direction.

Municipal elections in New York, Philadelphia, Louisville, Ky., and other cities in 1965 showed a sharp increase over the Presidential race of 1964 in the share of the Negro votes received by Republican candidates.

Clarence Townes, executive assistant to the Virginia Republican chairman, commented after today's meeting with Mr. Bliss that "Negroes desire as much as all Americans to maintain two roughly balanced parties, because two-party competition tends to protect the rights of all citizens."

Mr. Townes said he believed the maintenance of a two-party system would be "one of the best arguments" for Republicans among Negro voters this year.

Another participant in the meeting, J. Earl Dearing, the prosecuting attorney of Louisville, said that "the Republican party must stand for progress in urban America" in order to attract the support of Negro voters.

"We can't oppose everything," he declared.

REP. MARTIN JOINS RACE IN ALABAMA

Seeks G.O.P. Nomination for the Governorship

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 24 — United States Representative James D. Martin announced today that he would seek the Republican nomination for Governor of Alabama.

Alabama Republicans nominate by convention and he is considered certain to be named.

Mr. Martin, 47 years old, mad his long-expected announcement in his home town of Gadsden, 50 miles northeast of here in the Alabama hill country.

"The whole nation will be watching this election," he said, "for in the balance hangs the political realignment of the South, which has voted the Democrat ticket, with minor exception, for 100 years."

Mr. Martin's candidacy is an important link in the Republican party's plans for a two-party South. Knowing that a party must have the Governor's office to control patronage and build a state organization, the Republicans are making their strongest effort in modern history this year to elect Republican Governors in the South.

Could Win in 4 States

The party stands some chance of winning gubernatorial races in four Southern states, with Alabama being the most likely. The other possible winners are Representative Howard H. Callaway of Georgia, Representative John Bell Williams of Mississippi and Winthrop A. Rockefeller, Republican National Committeeman of Arkansas.

Neither Mr. Callaway nor Mr. Williams has announced his candidacy and Mr. Williams would have to transfer from the Democratic party, as Mr. Martin and Mr. Callaway have already done.

Mr. Rockefeller has been an announced candidate since 1964 when he was defeated by Gov. Orval E. Faubus, who announced Monday that he would not seek a seventh term.

Mr. Martin will probably oppose Mrs. George C. Wallace, wife of the Governor, in the November general election. Mrs. Wallace, who is running because the Governor is barred by the State Constitution from succeeding himself, is favored to win the Democratic primary May 3.

Close Friends

Mr. Martin and the Governor are close friends and there had been speculation that the Representative would not oppose the Governor's wife.

The two men disagree on political issues, except on racial matters. Both are strong segregationists, although Mr. Martin has not been as vociferous as Governor Wallace.

Mr. Martin is a stanch conservative. He voted against the Appalachia bill last year though it promised Federal funds to 11 of the 12 counties in his Seventh District.

His economic conservatism is reflected in the support he has already attracted in his race for governor. As an oil jobber, he once was president of the Associated Industries of Alabama. Many businessmen are said to be supporting him.

His campaign manager will be Hall Thompson of Birmingham, a wealthy contractor and dealer in heavy equipment.

Governor Wallace, although widely thought to be a conservative, has made an exceptionally liberal record in spending for state improvements. He has engineered large increases in educational expenditures. He has practiced deficit spending on a large scale, issuing many millions of dollars worth of revenue bonds to finance various improvements.

WAR CRITIC ENDS RACE FOR SENATE

Dugger, Texas Independent, Cites Debate on Vietnam

By MARTIN WALDRON
Special to The New York Times

AUSTIN, Tex., March 24—Ronnie Dugger, editor of a liberal political journal, The Texas Observer, withdrew today as a candidate for the United States Senate seat once held by President Johnson.

Mr. Dugger, an independent, said he had originally become a candidate to stimulate debate on the Vietnam war and what he felt was a slow drift toward a nuclear conflict.

But he cited reasons for a change.

"The televised Senate [Foreign Relations Committee] hearing [on the Vietnam war], Senator Robert F. Kennedy's increasing national leadership for a compromise peace in Vietnam, and the Gallup and other opinion polls—including the one showing that 88 per cent of the people favor negotiating with the Vietcong if they are willing to negotiate—leave the President no grounds for not knowing that the country is gravely divided on Vietnam, that the people do not want a general land war in Asia, and that we want the Vietnam fighting stopped—honorably, but stopped," Mr. Dugger said.

He observed that this left him no reason for running.

Many Texas political observers had predicted that Mr. Dugger's candidacy would siphon away enough liberal Democratic votes to insure the re-election this fall of Senator John G. Tower, a Goldwater Republican who has been President Johnson's No. 1 political target.

Mr. Dugger said he thought his decision to withdraw from the race would aid Texas Attorney General Waggoner Carr, who is expected to win the Democratic nomination for the Senate seat on May 5.

In 1961, many liberal Democrats refused to vote for the conservative incumbent Democratic Senator, William A. Blakley of Dallas, who was appointed to succeed Mr. Johnson. As a result, Mr. Tower was elected as the state's first Republican Senator in almost 100 years.

If Mr. Carr will avoid the "rigid" unyielding conservatism of the Texas Democratic party, "my withdrawal ought to help him," Mr. Dugger said.

Mr. Dugger said there had been no White House pressure on him to withdraw, although the President favors Mr. Carr.

"I have consulted many of my friends, but the decision is mine alone," he said. "No one from the White House or the other candidates' camps asked me not to run."

"Those who believed or alleged that my motive in filing was to beat Mr. Carr were, as I have said, mistaken," Mr. Dugger said. "I meant to beat them both. I hope, at least, that I have suggested to independent Texans a way to end one-party, big-money domination of Texas life if the Texas Democrats continue to offer the Texas voters only reaction and a tragic provincialism."

Georgia Democrats Fear a G.O.P. Race for Governorship by Rep. Callaway

By GENE ROBERTS
Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, March 27 — Georgia Democrats are worrying for the first time since Reconstruction about the possibility of a strong Republican bid for the governorship.

Their concern centers on Howard R. Callaway, who was elected in 1964 as the state's only Republican Congressman while Georgia was backing the Republican Presidential candidate, Barry Goldwater, 616,600 to 522,557.

Mr. Callaway refuses to say whether he will enter the race, but he is increasing the size of his staff and the frequency of his public appearances in the state. He has made no move to discourage a statewide petition drive for 125,000 signatures to put his name on the ballot.

A Callaway campaign would assure the Republican party of at least two strong challengers in seven governorship races this year. In Alabama, Representative James D. Martin, who was elected to the House in 1964, has already announced his candidacy for Governor and is regarded by many professional and amateur political analysts as the favorite.

Harding Sweep Recalled

If a Republican candidate wins, it will mark the party's first governorship victory in the South since 1920, when the landslide Presidential victory of Warren G. Harding carried Alfred Taylor into the Governor's mansion in Tennessee.

Although few Georfia Democratic leaders will publicly concede that they fear a challenge by Representative Callaway, many privately regard him seriously.

"How can we not take him seriously after what Barry Goldwater did here in 1964?" said one Democratic politician. "In addition, Callaway [a West Point graduate and owner of Callaway Gardens, a state tourist attraction] is a very personable candidate."

"I can't really believe that Georgia will ever elect a Republican Governor," said another Democrat. "But he sure could make us spend a lot of money. We wuld have to wage a major campaign against him."

Politicians in both parties talk of private polls, which show that Representative Callaway's name is widely known in Georgia and that he would command an unusually high vote for a Republican.

Arnall Trails in Poll

One Republican poll is said to show that Mr. Callaway is running ahead of former Gov. Ellis Arnall and is favored by 45 per cent of the voters against former Gov. Ernest Vandiver, another leading Democratic contender.

Mr. Callaway's supporters consider this a respectable starting point for a Republican campaign in the state. They appear confident that intensive television exposures will strengthen the 38-year-old businessman still further.

Many Democrats as well as Republicans are saying that Mr. Callaway can count on votes from segregationist rural areas, especially from southwest Georgia where his Congressional district is.

Two well-known Democrats—former Gov. Griffin, who polled 35 per cent of the vote in his last political race, and Harry Jackson, president pro tem of the Georgia Senate, have announced that they will support Mr. Callaway is he runs.

Mr. Callaway, who regards his victory in 1964 as much a "pro-conservative" mandate as an expression of "anticivil rights" sentiment, opposed President Johnson's bill that led to the Voting Rights Act of 1964 and is considered "safe" on civil rights legislation by segregationists. Negro registrations have been lagging here.

Meanwhile, it is widely believed that Senator Herman E. Talmadge will campaign for the Democratic candidate in an effort to hold white voters in line.

House Race Is Planned

Romney Says Government Is Restricting Flow of News

KANSAS CITY, Kan., March 26 (AP)—Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan attacked Saturday what he called "a mounting threat to the people's right to know . . . particularly in Washington."

The Governor, a Republican, told the Kansas Press Association in an address here that "the flow of news is being dammed at the source."

He said:

"Too often, the press is treated as an enemy and public opinion as a nuisance. Release of information is centralized. Security is invoked to cover up political indiscretions. Press conferences are rigged with planned questions.

Sanders' Day Is Later

WASHINGTON—Everything was coming up cherry blossoms for Sen. Richard B. Russell Wednesday. The pink blossoms are in fact bursting forth a week early in the capital. And spring was in the stride of the senator as he hiked along a Senate Office Building corridor. Word from back home was that Gov. Carl Sanders was pulling out of the race against him.

With his reelection thus assurred, and his health in good repair, Dick Russell's worries were over.

As for Gov. Sanders, even his best friends would tell him he made a smart decision. This didn't look like his year. At 40, he has a lot of years left and much to build on. The liability that cancelled out his chance against Russell this year was a nine-letter word spelled Goldwater. Sanders unreservedly championed Johnson and the Democratic party when the state was going the other way (and Sen. Russell was going to Spain). That hurt the governor in the short run. He could form no adequate support to budge Russell after that.

But time is likely to make Sanders' 1964 loyalty into an asset. Georgia is not going back to segregation or to reactionary isolation, but forward to a more modern time. When and as it does, Sanders' stand as a modern Democrat will pay off.

One smart observer who has always thought so is Lyndon Johnson.

He has been forming a school of modern Southern governors or ex-governors whose future he wants to help along. The President has counted Sanders a class leader from the start. He has brought some of them to Washington for postgraduate work—Tennessee's Buford Ellington, for instance, and Florida's Leroy Collins and Farris Bryant. He put Mississippi's James P. Coleman on the federal bench until the dust blows over out there. Considering Mr. Johnson's careful cultivation of promising perennials in the New South garden of the future, it will not be surprising in the least if he takes Sanders under the presidential wing for special preparation in the acquisition and dispensation of power over the long run.

For the present, the tide obviously has not turned in Georgia. The Democratic politicians who must run soon fear they are still under threat of Goldwaterism. So their engines are full astern. Witness the current onslaught on the desegregation efforts of the Office of Education.

But the Democratic party of South Carolina is already reconstituting itself as the party that can represent, among others, the Negro citizenry.

Such adjustments in party position are bound to spread around the South. The day will come when the voters will send for those modern Democrats who stayed Democrats when the going was hard.

Sanders has the time to wait.

Liberal Republicans Urge Party to Appeal to Negro and Punish Lily-Whites'

By DAVID S. BRODER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 12—Two liberal-Republican groups urged the Republican National Committee today to help register Southern Negroes and to discipline "lily-white" G.O.P. organizations in the South.

The liberals charged that it was sheer madness for Southern Republicans to run as segragationists.

Their recommendations, in a joint report, drew a cautious reaction from National Committee officials and immediate condemnation from some Southern G.O.P. state chairmen, presaging a major intraparty debate.

The groups that joined in the report are Republican Advance, an organization of some 50 students and teachers at Yale University, and Republicans for Progress, a national organization of liberal Republicans headed by Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati.

The report was based on a survey of Southern Republicanism by a six-man team headed by John Topping, chairman of Republican Advance. The project was financed by Republicans for Progress and by former Gov. Elmer Andersen of Minnesota.

Stress on Moderation

The main argument of the report was that the long-term interests of the Republican party, nationally and in the South, require that Southern Republicans appeal to Negro and moderate white sentiment, rather than to segregationist viewpoints, in their campaigns.

"The future of the Republican party in the South and in the nation rests heavily upon its ability to respond to the forces of change rapidly transforming Southern society," the report said. It continued: "If the Republican party bets on the forces on the way up — the Negro, the white middle class, the young professional— it will continue to grow. Yet should the Republican party choose instead to court segregationist white or Birchite extremists, while it may realize short-term gains, it surely will pay a heavypenalty for de-cades

The report commended Republican organizations in North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas and Virginia for efforts to build a "broad-based" party. It said a recent change in the party chairmanship in Mississippi offered "some hope that the Mississippi Republican party will seek to become a genuinely biracial party."

On the other hand the report assailed the Republican organization in Mississippi, South Carolina and Alabama as "lily white." It condemned a clause in the 1964 Mississippi Republican platform supporting "segregation of the races." It also charged that "strong forces are at work in a number of Southern state parties, particularly those of South Carolina and Alabama, to establish the Republican party on a white-only basis."

Report's Authors Assailed

Harry S. Dent, the South Carolina Republican chairman, said the authors of the report "don't know what they're talking about."

"This is no lily-white setup," he said. "The people of South Carolina are accepting the changes that are coming about. There are no whooping, hollering, chest-thumping segregationists in the Republican party here."

Mr. Dent acknowledged that there were no Negroes at last month's state Republican convention, but he said that was because no Negroes had offered themselves as candidates. "We had Negroes attend our precinct meetings and they were made welcome," he said.

Clark Reed, the Mississippi party chairman whose election was hailed in the report, said that "Negro leadership in this state is so extreme I see no way

United Press International
Charles P. Taft

at this time to get Negroes into the Republican party. I think it's a long way off."

Mr. Reed said he was endeavoring to "play down race" as an issue in Mississippi politics, but said, "I don't think much" of the liberal groups' recommendation that the Republican National Committee force Mississippi to revoke the segregation clause in its party platform. "We're loyalist Republicans," he said, "but I believe in live and let live."

Showdown Foreseen

The liberal groups' report said that a "national committee resolution requiring the elimination of such discriminatory provisions would both remove an ugly stain from the Republican record of fighting racism and strengthen the hand of fair-minded Southern Republicans in a showdown with racists in their party ranks."

The report said "the Southern Republican moderate desperately needs some assurance that he is not fighting alone." In many states, it added, "progressives who in the nineteen-fifites saw the Republican party as the best hope for surmounting the politics of race have recently joined the Democrati party, which has captured the torch of progress in much of the South."

In place of the progressives, the report said, "thousands of the most reactionary Democrats" have come int the G.O.P. In the 1964 Presidential campaign, the report said, "the Republican party appeared to be pandering to those elements in the South intent on turning back the clock of history."

The report said that former Senator Barry Goldwater's Presidential campaign had "failed to crry any of the states of the moderate South, such as Florida, Tennessee and Virginia, and had caused a "precipitate decline in Negro support [that) cost the Republican party probable gains of at least one Senate seat in Tennessee, house seats in Memphis, New Orleans and Atlanta and two House seats in North Carolina."

The authors noted that the five Southern states Mr. Goldwater carried—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina—were all states where more than 60 per cent of the eligible Negroes were unregistered, suggesting that such victories could only be temporary.

The report argued that "if the Republican party is to win elections in California, Ohio, Illinois, New York and Michiga it cannot afford the albatross of staunchly segregationist Fraternal parties in the Deep South." It urged the National Committee to take steps to assure biracial parties in the Southern states.

In addition to a reactivation of the committee's Minorities Division, already ordered by the national chairman, Ray C. Bliss, the report called for the creation of a special committee to enforce rules against racial or religious discrimination in any state or local Republican party activity.

It also said the National Committee should undertake, with Southern state parties, to encourage Negroes in the South to register as Republicans.

Mr. Bliss was out of the city today, but other committee officials expressed skepticism about the National Committee's authority to police the platforms or racial practices of state party organizations. As for registration of Negroes, they noted that Southern G.O.P. leaders attending recent meetings on "big city politics" had been urged to register all potential Republican voters.

Other steps urged in the repo include a Republican-sponsored civil rights conference in the South this year and nomination of Negro Republican candidates for offices in predominantly white areas.

GOP Report Bars Segregation

4/13/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Republicans must reject "the albatross of segregation" in line with rising new political forces in order to build a party of power in the South, an Eisenhower-oriented group declared in a report released Tuesday.

Actions taken by Republicans in the year ahead will be critical, said the report, and "will strongly shape the direction and influence the success of the Republican party in the South for the next generation.

"If the Republican party bets on the forces on the way up—the Negro, the white middle class, the young professional—it will continue to grow.

"Yet, should the Republican party choose instead to court segregationist white or Birchite extremists, while it may realize short-term gains, it will surely pay a heavy penalty for decades."

Direction of southern Republicans, said the report, will be crucial to national party elections in populous states outside the South.

The report, which by name needles some of the South's segregationist Republican leaders, grew out of a study made last summer and fall under sponsorship of the Republican Advance at Yale University and Republicans for Progress, described as a citizens organization of "leading Republican laymen and former members of the Eisenhower administration."

The Republican party can become the "bearer of the torch of reform" in the South by "gearing its programs to the solutions of long-festering local problems" that remain unsolved by the dominant Democratic party, said the report in laying out a formula for success in the changing region.

"However, the time is short for the Republican party to cast itself as a party of southern reform," warned the report. "Republicans must devote themselves to toppling racist and reactionary Democratic officeholders by Republican candidates committed to the advance of all races.

"If the Republican party chooses to campaign by going to the right of Senators James Eastland or Allen Ellender, it will only have itself to thank for its continuing irrelevancy in southern politics in coming decades. . . .

"The Republican party will face in its campaigns the choice of whether to repeat its 1964 appeals to the fears and prejudices of the old South or to offer to all southerners hope for a new tomorrow."

The report noted that Republicans made steady gains in the South during the era of former President Dwight Eisenhower and in 1960 Richard Nixon got a majority of the vote in Negro precincts in Atlanta.

The report continued, "It would seem an exercise in sheer madness for southern Republicans to write off the Negro vote . . . after race has ceased to be a crucial issue with southern whites, Negroes may still remember which party years before tried to block their advance."

The GOP image in the South cannot be confined to the region, said the report.

"If the Republican party is to win elections in California, Ohio, Illinois, New York and Michigan, it cannot afford the albatross of staunchly segregatonist fraternal parties in the Deep South," asserted the report.

"Defection of Dixiecrat politicians" such as Sen. Strom Thurmond and Rep. Albert Watson, both of South Carolina, was termed a source of embarrassment to Republicans.

Republican Rep. James Martin's campaign is likely to "center on where the Republicans believe the votes will be" in the Alabama governor's race this year, said the report, but there is little indication the Alabama GOP is moving toward a "moderate position."

Hundreds of thousands of Negroes are registering under the 1965 Voting Rights Act and an overwhelming majority are becoming Democrats, said the report. For example, it was reported that of 49,000 new Negro voters in Louisiana, "a pitifully low 2.5 per cent," registered as Republicans.

Republicans in North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas and Virginia were found to be building "broad-based, aggressive parties."

A ray of hope was seen in Mississippi with the replacement of arch-segregationist Republican chairman Wirt Yerger by moderate Clarke Reed.

The report also recommended that to promote the GOP in the South Southern GOP parties should nominate capable Negroes for office in predominantly white areas. It was pointed out that Negro Republican Q. V. Williamson was elected to the Atlanta aldermanic board over a white Democrat although the election was officially nonpartisan.

Decision for GOP

Race Attitude to Determine Party Future

THE Republican Party must soon make a fateful decision.

It must decide whether to make a clarion appeal to the increasing number of moderates in the South or, as in 1964, to play on the racial fears and prejudices that the South is putting behind it.

Drummond

Some Republican leaders may think they can have it both ways—tell the Nation as a whole how consistently the Party has stood for racial justice and allow Southern GOP candidates to stand for racial discrimination.

It won't work. Even if it worked for the Democrats sometimes in the past, the past is not the present and it will not work in 1966 and 1968.

Nowhere has this GOP problem been as impressively stated as in the "Southern Project Report" just released by the Republican Advance of Yale University and Republicans for Progress, a citizens' group of Party moderates most of whom were active in the Eisenhower Administration.

THE AUTHORS of this report spent several months studying the problems and opportunities of the Republican Party in every Southern state. I think its conclusions are unanswerable.

It points out that the one-party system of the South is in the throes of change and that the political alignments of tomorrow will depend largely on which party allies itself with the forces of the future. And then this challenge to the GOP:

"If the Republican Party bets on the forces on the way up — the Negro, the burgeoning new white middle class, the young professional — it will continue to grow. Should the Republican Party choose instead to court segregationist white or Birchite extremists, while it may realize short-term gains, it will surely pay a heavy penalty for decades.

"It must be evident that the 1965 Voting Rights Act will shortly make race a dead-end political street. Will the Republicans react too late to the inevitable to develop meaningful biracial Southern parties?"

MANY WILL agree that any Republican retreat from an unwavering commitment to equal opportunity for all citizens would be morally blameworthy. But the "Southern Project Report" also shows it would be sheer political folly.

Here is the evidence:

While Sen. Goldwater carried five states of the Deep South, he failed to carry any of the states of the moderate South. What is more important is that the Negro citizens in all of these five states who are now registering will hold the balance of power in any future election. These are the telltale figures:

State	Goldwater's	No. of unregistered
Alabama	268,353	388,583
Georgia	94,043	445,247
Louisiana	122,157	349,988
Mississippi	303,856	393,756
South Carolina	93,348	232,560

Since Lyndon B. Johnson received more than 90 per cent of the Negro vote, Goldwater would have lost every one of these states if Negroes had been free to register and vote. They are registering today and, have no doubt about it, they are going to vote next fall and in 1968.

By every test of voting in recent years, it is clear that the voters of the Nation are overwhelmingly united behind the cause of equal opportunity and racial justice. It is my conviction that, if the Republican Party tries to hold the Negro at arm's length in the South, at the very time when the Democrats are opening their Party to Negroes, the GOP will lose in the Nation and in the South for a generation or more.

2 Liberal GOP Groups Urge Party To Press for Negro Vote in South

By Robert E. Baker
Washington Post Staff Writer

Two liberal Republican organizations have warned their party to seek the Negro vote in the South now or face "catastrophic long-range implications" in the future.

The advice, with recommendations, came from a "Southern Project Report" sponsored by the Republicans for Progress and the Republican Advance.

The report released today painted the South as the "most politically volatile region" of the United States, with a growing Southern middle class and a growing Negro vote but with race receding as an issue.

Choice of Goldwater Hit

It called the 1964 Republican National Convention and the nomination of Barry Goldwater for President "morally blameworthy" and "sheer folly" politically.

Some Republican leaders in the South correctly see the future, the report said, but strong forces are at work—especially in South Carolina and Alabama — to establish the GOP on a lily-white basis.

"It is imperative that national Republican leaders and well-intentioned party leaders in these states act decisively to stem this tragic tide," the report said.

The Goldwater campaign did capture five Deep South states, the report said, but failed to carry any moderate Southern state and probably costs the party one Senate seat and five House seats.

Retaliation at the Polls

The Republican Party cannot afford a lily-white image in the South, the report stated, because Negros will retaliate at the polls for generations and the GOP would suffer at the hands of future voters now on campuses who support civil rights and from the opposition of opinion makers — the clergy and the press.

Some Republicans note that the Democratic Party had its segregationist wing but won elections, the report acknowledged. But the Democrats enjoyed a powerful pro-civil rights Northern wing and Republicans failed to exploit "the Democratic Southern albatross," the report said.

It added that the Democratic Party in 1964 broke with its segregationist past.

"For the Republican Party to adopt the Democratic strategy of ambivalence just as that party is discarding its obsolete posture, it would need to renounce any notions of being the 'party of the future'," the report said.

"Forces on the Way Up"

"If the Republican Party bets on the forces on the way up—the Negro, the white middle class, the young professional — it will continue to grow," the report said. But it will pay heavily for decades if it courts segregationist white or Birchite extremists, the report went on.

It recommended that the Republican National Committee require state parties to repeal segregation clauses, appoint an ethical standards committee to implement this and strip any state organization that refuses.

It called on all Republican state organizations to make an effort to register new Negro voters as Republicans. And it called on civil rights leaders to encourage Negro participation in the Republican Party to influence and moderate it from within.

Conference Urged

Other recommendations included: reactivation of the Minorities Division of the Republican National Committee, holding a Conference on the Republican Party and Human Rights, announcement by the GOP Congressional leadership that it welcomes Democratic defectors who agree on the principle of equal opportunity.

Republicans for Progress was organized by liberal and moderate Republicans last year under the chairmanship of Charles P. Taft, former Mayor of Cincinnati and brother of the late Sen. Robert A. Taft (R-Ohio). Republican Advance was formed in 1950.

Negro Vote in South . . .

POLITICS

By William S. White

Problems for Both National Parties

THE FIRST substantial returns from the Government's campaign to spread Negro voting registration in the South raise perplexing problems for both national parties.

White

Both yearn to capture this new potential vote; but the question of how to do it is opening cans of worms.

The Department of Justice now estimates that in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina Negro registration is up 47 per cent. But in none of the five States does it amount to more than 25 per cent of the white voting registration. Moreover, a bridge yet to be crossed is how many of these Negro registrants will in fact vote this fall. A franchise extended is not a franchise used.

In any event, the old vision of Northern liberal politicians in both parties of some overturn in the whole traditional Southern power structure, with the masses of new black voters willy-nilly casting out the old Southern politicians wholesale, is still a pipe-dream.

IT HAS always been irrational, for it has been based on a doctrinaire misreading of the realities of Southern life. These politicians have assumed that given the ballot the Southern Negroes would at once draw up into a monolith automatically obedient to the will of an essentially theoretical Northern racial liberalism. But the white Northern liberal has never realized that Southern Negroes are first of all people and as such have a whole complex of desires of which the vote is only one. Nor are they so ideological about political civic rights as are Northern Negroes. Moreover, they are quite as interested in such things as jobs and housing.

And it so happens that many of the sitting white Southern politicians in Congress have long delivered in these fields even while they have been adamant against civil rights bills as such. Thus, any theory that, say, Sen. John Sparkman will now be punished by the Negro registrants in Alabama is over-simplified out of sight.

Equally oversimplified is the supposition of liberal Republican groups like Charles P. Taft's Republicans for Progress that about all the GOP need do is to go about proclaiming a total liberalism on the race question. The new Southern Negro voter is not going to rush to support some Republican candidate simply because that candidate is loudly pro-civil rights.

THAT VOTER, again no different from a white voter, will first ask himself whether the GOP candidate has the slightest chance of being elected anyhow.

The truth is that both parties will have to approach this new situation with all wariness; to give up any idea of some all-Southern and unvarying strategy. A line effective in one place could be disastrous in another. Any Republican appeal primarily to Negroes—and to them only in civil rights terms — would fail. For it would alienate a more useful potential bloc—the newly emerging Southern white middle class that is attracted to Republicanism because of its general conservatism.

Similarly, any Democratic campaign overly tub-thumping the party's Voting Rights Act of 1965 would of itself not necessarily draw net gains among the Negroes. And it would speed the departure of the new white Southern middle class into the GOP—so long, that is, as the GOP kept its arms reasonably wide.

WHAT BOTH parties need, in a word, is to play it cool and to walk in moderation with the two races.

This necessity is the keener for the Republicans simply because in the South they are outs trying to get in over a historic Democratic bulge that it will take much doing permanently to cut down. A two-party system will never arrive in the South solely or even mainly because of increased Negro participation in voting. It will arrive upon the ever-rising strength of the new businessman middle class, white and Negro but mostly white.

4 of 5 Democrats in Primary Urge Change in Policy of Rights Resistance

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., April 16—A major revolution in the tone of Alabama political campaigning is taking place as 11 candidates fight to become the Democratic nominee for Governor in the primary on May 3.

In sharp contrast to past gubernatorial campaigns, none of the candidates is using "race-baiting" as a political tactic. Moreover, four of the five major candidates are promising to alter the state's policy of stiff resistance to Negro civil rights advances.

Many analysts credit the change in political rhetoric to the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which has resulted in the registration of 117,000 Negroes since its enactment last August. There are now 228,000 registered Negroes, representing about one-fourth of total registration.

New Era Foreseen

Some believe, also, that the campaign—the first major one in the Deep South since the act was passed—marks the beginning of a new era of political sophistication not only for Alabama, but also for the Deep South as a whole.

"The word 'segregation' has virtually disappeared from the political vocabulary," said an editor of The Birmingham Post-Herald.

An Alabama political reporter said that he had been covering political rallies almost daily for the last month and had yet to hear the word "nigger."

Segregation is a strong silent issue, however, and many politicians say it has made Mrs. Lurleen Wallace, the wife of Gov. George C. Wallace, the front-runner in the current campaign.

The Governor, who is barred by the state constitution from succeeding himself, now omits the word "segregation" from the speeches he makes for his wife, but promises no change in his policy of resistance to civil rights demands.

Defends States' Rights

Governor Wallace still defends "states' rights" and denounces the Federal Government's guidelines for school desegregation as an "encroachment" upon local government. These are phrases that his supporters equate with resistance to racial integration, and they cheer him loudly when he uses them.

The Governor has modified his pronouncements on the race issue, some of his opponents say, because he is concerned that Negro voters might bolt en masse to the Republican candidate, United States Representative James D. Martin, in the November general election if Mrs. Wallace wins the Democratic nomination.

Mr. Martin, once a stanch segregationist, has also modified his position and now says racial differences in Alabama will largely disappear if enough new industry can be attracted to the state to provide employment for both races.

4 Rivals Vying For Run-Off

Meanwhile, many politicians give four Democratic candidates a chance of coming in second in the initial primary and, thus, winning the chance to oppose Mrs. Wallace in a run-off on May 31. They are Attorney General Richmond M. Flowers, former United States Representative Carl Elliott, State Senator Robert Gilchirst and former Gov. John M. Patterson.

The supporters of these candidates concede privately that Mrs. Wallace has pre-empted the segregationist vote and that they, as a result, can make it into the run-off only by capturing the votes of Negroes and white moderates and liberals.

In an effort to enhance his position among this wing of the electorate, Mr. Patterson abruptly shelved his segregationist speeches three weeks ago. He now promises to "enforce the law equally, fairly and impartially" and to be the Governor of "all the people regardless of who they are."

Mr. Patterson's switch in tactics both surprised and delighted Negro leaders, who remember him best for preventing the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People from operating in the state and for refusing to invite Negro high school bands to march in his inaugural parade in 1959.

Although Mr. Patterson was widely believed to be the favorite in the campaign only three months ago, his chances of even making it into the run-off dropped sharply when segregationists began bolting to Mrs. Wallace.

Meanwhile, many of the state's white moderates and liberals are campaigning hard for Mr. Elliott, who established a liberal voting record in Congress before being upset in 1964 during the Republican Presidential landslide in the state.

"Alabama cannot afford to be known," Mr. Elliott says, "as a state wracked from top to bottom by discord year after year."

Mr. Elliott needs some Negro votes, however, and standing in his way is Attorney General Flowers, who is campaigning directly among Negroes and promises, if elected, to give state jobs to Negroes who are active in the civil rights movement.

Mr. Flowers received the endorsement tonight of the Confederation of Alabama Political Organizations, which was organized by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference. He is favored to win the endorsement tomorrow of the Alabama Democratic Conference, which has the support of many leaders of Negro business, professional and labor organizations, along with the N.A.A.C.P.

A third Negro political group, the Black Panther party, which is supported by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, is skeptical of all the candidates. It is dominant only in Lowndes County.

Strength in North

Mr. Flowers's best chance for gaining the white vote to supplement his Negro support lies in the cities in north Alabama where voters are less sensitive to the racial issue than in the heavily agricultural southern areas of the state. But the same white voters are being wooed by Mr. Elliott and Senator Gilchrist and both are drawing more white Alabamians to their rallies than is Mr. Flowers.

"For too long the demagogues have planted the seeds of discord," says Mr. Gilchrist, who has the support of both The Birmingham News and The Post-Herald, "and no state can prosper in such an atmosphere."

Meanwhile, with the primary less than three weeks away, the only certain winner for the run-off position against Mrs. Wallace appears to be the state's Negroes.

"Things are looking up in Alabama," said Orzell Billingsley, a Negro lawyer who heads the Democratic Conference. "Times are changing."

POLITICS: Sanders Is a Poser for Callaway

By SAM HOPKINS
Constitution Political Editor

If Republican Howard (Bo) Callaway runs for governor this year and wins it will be the biggest political victory in Georgia's history.

However, many now believe that the political cards are so stacked against him that he could wind up as the joker in the deck if he runs.

There is no doubt that Rep. Callaway has some of the credentials necessary to win a race at this time—the main one being that he is an out-and-out conservative.

Many candidates strongly feel that "conservative" is the magic word that will open the door to political victory in Georgia this year.

But it is becoming more and more apparent that since Gov. Carl E. Sanders announced last month he wouldn't oppose Sen. Richard B. Russelll that Callaway will give a more serious analysis to his chances of defeating the Democratic nominee.

Sam Hopkins

Although there might be some of the same bitter feelings this year as in 1964 when Georgia went Republican for the first time in its history, there will be no national candidate against whom disgruntled voters can vent their spleen.

INCRESASES UNITY

Gov. Sanders' withdrawal from the U.S. Senate race has definitely resulted in more unity among Georgia Democrats. A Sanders-Russell race would have split them wide open.

So now Callaway is faced with the prospect of not only defeating the Democratic nominee for governor, but to some extent every other major Democratic officeholder.

This imposing array includes Sen. Herman Talmadge, Gov. Sanders, Sen Russell, Agriculture Commissioner Phil Campbell, Compt. Gen. James Bentley, members of the Georgia Public Service Commission, Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton.

It is believed that most of these Democratic leaders would actively work for the Democratic nominee if Callaway were in the race.

LOOKING AT 1968

Sen. Talmadge in particular could be expected to openly oppose Callaway because some persons feel Callaway will be shooting for Talmadge's seat in the 1968 elections.

Most Democrats think Callaway will have a hard time finding a key issue on which to build a platform. The main one may boil down to, "Let's be different and put a Republican in office."

Despite all the pitfalls, Callaway is by no means out of the race yet. He knows he would get a considerable vote.

And he is aware that if he has aspirations for the governor's chair at the State Capitol this is the best possible year to go for broke.

HOPEFUL OF WORD

Many Republicans will be hoping Callaway will announce his candidacy on May 6 at the state GOP convention in Macon.

But Callaway himself says he may wait till the middle of summer before he discloses his plans.

Still, the Macon meeting would be the perfect place to announce. And Georgia politics could stand a surprise or two here and there.

Alabama Negroes Urged Not to Vote

By GENE ROBERTS
Special to The New York Times

SELMA, Ala., April 19—The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is urging Negroes to boycott the Democratic primary on May 3 in several of Alabama's predominantly Negro counties.

It wants Negroes to withhold their votes until the November general election and then support candidates of independent county political parties that it is organizing.

Stokley Carmichael, the committee's senior field secretary in Alabama, said his civil rights organization was "unconcerned" over the possibility that its action might defeat some Negro and moderate white candidates in the primaries and result in the nomination of Dallas County Sheriff James G. Clark Jr. and other segregationists.

He said he and other committee leaders preferred to see segregationists get Democratic nominations for office because this would show "the real face of the Democratic party."

"The Negro can't control the Democratic party on the state or county levels in Alabama," said Courtland Cox, another of the committee's field secretaries, "and he ought to organize something he can control."

Boycott's Impact Seen

Albert Turner, state director of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian leadership Conference, which is active in the primaries, believes the committee cannot influence enough Negro voters to affect the outcome of statewide races. However, he said that its boycott could affect campaigns in Dallas and "one or two other counties."

Mr. Turner considers the Dallas County sheriff's race one of the state's most important political campaigns because it pits Public Safety Director Wilson Baker against Mr. Clark.

Civil rights workers regard Mr. Baker as a "moderate" in racial matters and look upon the sheriff as one of the leading enemies of the civil rights movement.

In an effort to repair his reputation with Negroes, Mr. Clark has stopped wearing his "Never" button, but Negroes remember that he and his deputies used nightsticks against them in an attempt to disperse voter registration demonstrations in Selma last year. However, Mr. Carmichael declared.

"We'd rather see Jim Clark elected than Wilson Baker, because Baker would give the Democratic party a respeitability that it doesn't deserve.

"To ask Negroes to get in the Democratic party is like asking Jews to join the Nazi party."

The political parties the student committee is organizing vary from county to county. In Lowndes County it is the Freedom Organization, in Dallas County the Independent Free Voters Organization.

Organizers are also attempting to set up parties in Greene, Wilcox, Perry, Sumter and Macon Counties.

Mr. Carmichael said he would not put the committee in the position of being held responsible for the defeat of Negro candidates in the primary "unless we are sure we can get a party going in the county; then, it would be worth the risk."

He said the Negro candidates in the Democratic primary were making a mistake in going after offices such as sheriff before gaining complete control of such key boards as revenue commissions and boards of education.

"Until the Negro gets complete control of a county," he declared, "I would just as soon have harassment [by white sheriffs] continue so Negroes can see what they are dealing with."

Electioneering Law Scored

WASHINGTON, April 19 (AP)—The Supreme Court was asked today to strike down Alabama's Corrupt Practices Act and throw off what was called the "blanket of silence" the state places on news media on election day.

The plea was lodged by an attorney for James E. Mills, editor of The Birmingham Post-Herald, who is charged with violating the law by writing an editorial on election day in 1962 that was construed as "electioneering."

"We see no legitimate interest in Alabama's curtailing expression," Alfred Swedlaw of Birmingham said in attacking the law as a violation of the First Amendment's guarantee of a free press. Its broad sweep, he said, "has had a chilling effect on the press of Alabama generally."

However, Burgin Hawkins, chief deputy District Attorney of Birmingham, said the law, enacted in 1940, "plays an important part in having an orderly election."

"The evil sought to be prevented is corruption of the electorate" and this is particularly desirable now, he said, because many people who will vote for the first time under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are "illiterates who will have difficulties at the polls."

Mr. Mills has not yet been brought to trial, but the Alabama Supreme Court has ruled that the law would apply to the charge against him.

5 COLLEGES IN SOUTH GET RIGHTS WARNING

WASHINGTON, April 19 (AP)—The Office of Education told five Southern colleges today that they might lose their Federal aid for failing to comply with the 1964 Civil Rights Act. It was the first time the Government had threatened to move against colleges.

The colleges were cited for failing to file assurances of compliance with Title VI of the act, or for filing unacceptable ones. The provision of the act bars Federal financial assistance to any program or activity that discriminates on the basis of race, color or national origin.

The colleges are Marion Institute, Marion, Ala.; Mississippi College, Clinton, Miss.; Bob Jones University, Greenville, S. S.; Freewill Baptist Bible College, Nashville, Tenn., and Sweet Briar College, Sweet Briar, Va.

The Office of Education said today it had sent notices to the colleges informing them of the opportunity to request a public hearing on its action.

One issue involved is the eligibility of the institutions to receive Federal aid during this fiscal year for student loan programs under the National Defense Education Act. Other questions are whether the colleges can make loans from funds carried over from previous years, or retain Federal money received for loan purposes in previous years.

School Compliances Rise

WASHINGTON, April 18 (AP)—The Office of Education said Monday it had received 687 assurances of compliance with the 1966 school desegregation guidelines for districts in the 17 Southern and Border states.

Group in Alabama Works for Balance in Government

NYT 4/21/66

By GENE ROBERTS

TUSKEGEE, Ala., April 20—If he could use ordinary political arithmetic in computing his chances, Lucius D. Amerson would be a heavy favorite to become one of Alabama's first Negro sheriffs since Reconstruction.

He is running in a county in which registered Negro voters outnumber whites by more than two to one and in a year in which the color of a candidate's skin is an important political qualification.

But Mr. Amerson's county is Macon, the home of predominantly Negro Tuskegee Institute, and Mr. Amerson has problems.

His candidacy is being quietly opposed by Negro leaders who feel that Negroes ought to preserve racially balanced government by reserving some offices—the sheriff's office for one—for the county's white minority.

The Macon County Democratic Club, the county's dominant Negro political organization, adopted the "balanced government" concept two years ago when, after a prolonged Negro boycott of white merchants, the county became the first in the state to have more Negro registrations than white. The idea was to move slowly and attempt to promote integration throughout the South by showing that a Negro majority could be tolerant of a white minority.

In the Tuskegee municipal elections in 1964, the club refused to endorse all of the Negro candidates and thus helped elect a white mayor and a city council composed of three whites and two Negroes.

A sizable percentage of the club's active members want to use the same approach in making endorsements for the Democratic primary, May 3, in which Negroes are seeking 7 out of 8 available offices. But still others are arguing that the time has come to put more key offices in the hands of Negroes.

"I don't know how it is all going to come out," said Mr. Amerson this week while he sat in his new automobile, which is adorned with a loudspeaker and campaign posters.

"I'm well received everywhere I go," the 32-year-old former Wrmy sergeant said, "but we do have some Negroes who feel the time is not right for a Negro sheriff."

Running against Mr. Amerson are three white men, including incumbent sheriff Harvey A. Sadler, who recently won favor among some Negroes by appointing a Negro deputy.

The Macon County Democratic Club, meanwhil, is withholding any endorsement until the night before the election. "I wouldn't attempt to predict what the club will do — many people want a Negro sheriff," said C. G. Gomillion, the retired dean of Tuskegee Institute who heads the organization. "But I would expect that the club will support some white candidates. We would be vigorously opposed to anything that could lead to all-Negro government."

But sone Negroes in the county believe that the club, while still powerful, may not be asb strong a force as it was in the 1964 elections. Then, the county had 4,000 registered Negroes, many of them connected with Tuskegee Institute. Since then, however, another 2,600 Negroes have registered and many of them are rural Negroes with few ties to the college community, which controls te Democratic club. Tere ahre about 2,7000 white voters.

"A lot of Negroes may not follow the endorsement this year," said Frank Reid, a Negro service station owner. "A lot of them want to see more Negroes in office."

Mr. Gomillion and his supporters have argued that if Negroes are not cautious in exercising their power, they could drive the 200 white students out of Tuskegee's integrated public schools and into the white school, Macon Academy, which has recently been losing support.

With Negro Vote Rising in South, Liberals Run for Office Again

POLITICS

By GENE ROBERTS 4/25/66

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, April 24 — Some of the South's best-known liberals and racial moderates are emerging from political retirement this year to enter Democratic primaries in which large numbers of newly enfranchised Negroes will be voting.

Most of them are underdogs, but they appear confident that the attitudes and composition of the Southern electorate are changing rapidly enough to give them another chance at political office.

Among those trying for a comeback are Ellis G. Arnall of Georgia, Brooks Hays of Arkansas, Armistead L. Boothe of Virginia, Carl Elliott of Alabama and Camille Gravel of Louisiana.

They are being joined in Senatorial and governorship races by younger liberals and by one-time segregationists who are revamping their images to woo Negro and moderate white voters.

Although there is still no shortage of conservative and segregationist candidates in most Democratic primaries, the resurgence of liberals and moderates is upgrading the party's position among Negroes in the South.

This is coming at a time when Republican organizations in Alabama, South Carolina, and Mississippi are being assailed as "lily-white" by liberal Northern elements within their own party.

In a recent joint report, the Republican Advance and Republicans for Progress said it was madness for Southern Republicans to run as segregationists in the face of a rapidly increasing Negro electorate.

Republicans for Progress is a national group of Republican liberals headed by Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati. The Republican Advance is a group of 50 instructors and students at Yale University.

The Justice Department has estimated that 340,000 Negroes have registered in Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Mississippi since the passage of the voting rights act last August. A Democratic spokesman also said that the act has spurred Negro registration in the six other states of the Confederacy, but that no figures are available.

Among Democrats likely to benefit from the rising Negro vote is Armistead Boothe, who as a Virginia legislator in the middle and late nineteen-fifties led the opposition to the "massive resistance" program fashioned by former Senator Harry F. Byrd in an attempt to halt school desegregation.

Views Helped Defeat Him

Mr. Boothe's racial views contributed to his defeat in 1961 in a race for lieutenant governor. After that, he remained out of elective politics until this spring, when he announced he would run in the July primaries against Harry F. Byrd Jr., who succeeded his father in the United States Senate.

"The progress has been astounding," said Mr. Boothe, who believes his opponent's name and not his own views on race is his biggest obstacle among white voters.

"Ten years ago, I thought it would take Virginia 20 to 25 years to reach this point," he added. "And just five years ago, after I was defeated, I thought I was through in politics."

Another comeback is being attempted in Georgia by Mr. Arnall, who as the state's Governor between 1943 and 1947 came under sharp attack by segregationists for having abolished the state's poll tax. Fiscal conservatives also joined in the criticism against him when he sharply increased spending for public education.

Near the end of his administration, Mr. Arnall wrote a book that added to the agitation of his critics. He called the book "The Shore Dimly Seen" and used it to describe his vision of a South in which racial friction and poverty would no longer exist.

20 Years After

After the elapse of 20 years, Mr. Arnall, now 59 years old, has changed the title of his book to "The Shore Clearly Seen" and is using it as campaign literature in his race for a second term as Governor.

Despite reports of confidential polls which show him to be trailing, Mr. Arnall says he will pick up more support before the September primary and defeat former Gov. Ernest Vandiver, who said, "No, not one . . ." in 1958 when Negroes were demanding school desegregation.

Ellis G. Arnall, the former Governor of Georgia.

"It is time for Georgia to move forward again," said Mr. Arnall, who prefers to call himself a Democrat "with both a capital and a little D," rather than a liberal, a term he considers vague.

In Arkansas, some politicians rank Brooks Hays as a favorite to win the Democratic nomination for Governor in the July primary. His career seemed over in 1958, when, during Little Rock's turmoil over school desegregation, Dale Alford, a segregationist ousted him from his seat in the United States House of Representatives. The chief issue was Mr. Hays's plea for peaceful acceptance of desegration.

Now, after working as an aide to both President Kennedy and President Johnson, Mr. Hays is campaigning again. And the race may show more clearly than any other whether there has been a substantial shift in the attitude of the Southern voter.

Test in Louisiana

Another test will come in Louisiana where Camille Gravel, former Democratic National Committeeman, is opposing Senator Allen J. Ellender in the August primary. Mr. Gravel's ties with the national Democratic party as well as his moderate views on the race issue stripped him of much of his following in Louisiana in the early sixties.

His close relationship with President Kennedy kept him in the public eye until Mr. Kennedy's assassination, and then he dropped quietly from the state's political picture.

In Alabama, Carl Elliott is campaigning for the Democratic nomination for Governor in the primary of May 3 after having been ousted from the United States House of Representatives by a Republican in 1964, during the Johnson presidential landslide in the state.

Once the state's most liberal Congressman, Mr. Elliott has the support of organized labor and many of President Johnson's white "loyalists," but he is losing support among Negroes to Attorney General Richmond Flowers who frequently quotes President Kennedy and promises to appoint civil rights activists to state posts.

Mr. Flowers is one of several candidates who believes that the mood of the South has changed sufficiently to make an identification with President Kennedy an asset rather than a liability.

Friend of President Kennedy

In South Carolina, former Gov. Ernest F. Hollins, a candidate for the Senate, is known as an admirer of Mr. Kennedy, as is Miami Mayor Robert King High, who is running for Governor of Florida.

And in Tennessee, John Jay Hooker Jr., a young lawyer and friend of the Kennedy family, is campaigning for the Democratic nomination for Governor against former Gov. Buford Ellington, who no longer calls himself an "old-fashioned segregationist."

Except in Tennessee, however, where Mr. Hooker is widely known to be an ally of Senator Robert F. Kennedy and Mr. Ellington is considered a personal friend of President Johnson, few candidates in the South are linking themselves publicly with either the Johnson Administration or with Senator Kennedy.

"If you want to attract Negro and liberal white supporters it is only essential that you quote from President Kennedy," said an aide to one liberal candidate. "People know immediately where you stand."

St. Patrick's Mass Opens Catholic Charities Appeal

Cardinal Spellman presided yesterday at a pontifical mass that opened the 1966 Catholic Charities Appeal. About 1,500 persons attended the 10 A. M. service in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

The annual appeal, which will be conducted in the 403 parishes comprising the New York Archdiocese, has a goal of $3.7-million.

Volunteers will conduct a 10-day house-to-house solicitation of Roman Catholic families.

Gimmicks Drum Up Crowds

Country Music To Go-Go — Alabama's Campaign Story

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — You've got to have a gimmick to drum up the crowds when you run for governor in Alabama — anything from country music to go-go girls.

The candidates seeking the Democratic nomination in Tuesday's primary have given their campaign audiences some of the highest-priced entertainment in the hillbilly music world.

But the real eye-popper is a curvaceous go-go girl who travels with a rock 'n' roll band to assemble the crowds for Decatur attorney Sherman Powell.

The office seeker may or may not tell the people what they want to hear, but no one — in the male audience at least — complains about the white-clad figure of Jackie Whitley and the skin-tight slacks and sweater she usually wears.

Former Congressman Carl Elliott, another of the 10 candidates, has alternated with Hank Williams Jr., one of the hottest numbers in the country music fraternity, and the Statesmen Quartet, one of the South's best-known gospel singing groups.

IN THE closing days of the campaign, Elliott has used both young Williams and the Statesmen at a cost which may run well into four figures a week.

Gov. George C. Wallace's wife, Lurleen, also has turned to the Grand Old Opry for some of its top recording stars — the Wilburn Brothers, George Morgan, Hank Thompson. When the big-name entertainers aren't around, she has a guitar-strumming Alabama group.

Former Gov. James E. Folsom, who started the hillbilly band technique of campaigning 20 years ago, still has some of his original musicians. They call themselves the Red Raiders in tribute to the Alabama volunteers who fought in the war against Mexico.

EX-GOV. John A. Patterson campaigns with Rebe Gosdin and the Sunny Valley Boys, the same band he used in his successful race eight years ago.

Occasionally, State Sen. Bob Gilchrist comes out with a night club entertainer and his swing band.

Agriculture Commissioner A. W. Todd also features a string band. He calls them the Todd-O-Longs.

Eunice Gore, who says he has a divine call to run for governor, offers chances on an expensive boat and motor to those who contribute to his campaign fund — one chance for $1, three chances for $2.

The other two candidates, Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers and millionaire businessman Charles Woods, have done little stump speaking, and have used no crowd-luring gimmicks.

King Foresees as Many as 50 Alabama Negro Nominations

POLITICS 5/1/66 AC

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

TUSCALOOSA, Ala., April 30. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., predicted Saturday that as many as 50 negroes might win nomination to office in Alabama's Democratic primary Tuesday.

He said he thought Negroes would vote heavily and that 95 per cent of them would cast their ballots for Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers for the Democratic nomination for governor. Dr. King has not endorsed Flowers, but he has made clear in his public utterances that the liberal attorney general is his favorite.

KING made his election prediction in an interview here as he continued a two-day pre-election tour of Alabama.

He rushed by automobile through the heavily Negro populated counties, urging large crowds at each stop to go to the polls Tuesday.

His plea has been a mixture of religious fervor and practical politics.

He told 500 persons at the First African Baptist Church here Saturday morning that Negroes must "stick together" and vote as a bloc to make their votes effective. Then in a crescendo of rhetoric at the end of his speech he shouted:

"Let us be dissatisfied — until men have food for their bodies, education for their minds, and freedom and dignity for their spirits."

THE NOBEL PRIZE winner visited nine Black Belt counties in South Alabama Friday, drawing crowds of 300 to 1,000 at each stop. Saturday, he spoke at Tuscaloosa, Bessemer, Birmingham, Gadsden and Anniston.

Negroes Control Vote In 3 'Bama Counties

POLITICS 5/1/66 AC

By The Associated Press

The Southern Regional Council said Saturday Negroes will control more than 50 per cent of the voting strength in three Alabama counties in the state's Democratic primary Tuesday.

In one of the counties—Greene—the council's voter education organization estimated Negroes can control more than 66 per cent of the total vote. In Wilcox County the figure is 52.4 per cent and in Macon County 50.6 per cent.

In addition, the SRC said, registration figures based on field reports and other sources give Negroes a near-equal share of the vote in five other counties: Hale 47.6 per cent, Bulloch 44.1 per cent, Sumter 46.9 per cent, Dallas 46.3 per cent and Marengo 44.9 per cent.

An over-all Negro balloting power of about 40 per cent is estimated for the 15 counties in which Negro candidates are seeking nominations for such offices as sheriff, tax assessor, coroner, county commissioner, board of education membership and Democratic executive committeeman.

SRC SAID figures are based on a running total of Negro registration in Southern states kept by the council's voter education project. The council said Negro registration in Alabama's 67 counties has risen from 112,000 to an estimated 226,000 since the 1965 Voting Rights Act was passed last August.

"Estimates of the Negro percentage of the voter totals are conservative," the SRC said, "because many of the counties involved show a white registration higher than the 1960 census figure on the number of whites eligible to vote."

The SRC said that in Lowndes County, where Negroes plan to run independent Black Panther party candidates in the November general election, Negroes have approximately 45.8 per cent of the total voting power.

In three Alabama House districts where Negroes are aiming for representation, Negro registration is estimated at 44.5 per cent in District 27, 46.3 per cent in District 28 and 38.1 per cent in District 31.

Almost all of the counties involved are in the south Alabama area known as the Black Belt, named for its rich soil.

122,000 New Registrants to Put Segregation Politics to a Test in Primaries

NYT 5/3/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., May 2 — Racial segregation in Alabama's state and local governments will face its first massive electoral challenge of this century when voters take part tomorrow in statewide Democratic primaries.

Nine opponents — all but one of them promising to modify the state's militantly segregationist stance on the race issue — are attempting to defeat Mrs. George C. Wallace, wife of the present Governor.

And 54 Negroes are campaigning for such offices as sheriff, county commissioner and state legislator against white incumbents who say the "Southern way of life" is at stake.

Tomorrow's contest was set in motion last year when Negro civil rights organizations carried out a series of voter registration demonstrations that culminated last August in the enactment of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Since then, 122,000 Alabama Negroes have registered under the law, raising the total number of registered Negroes in the state to 235,000.

Although Mrs. Wallace is favored to come in first in the primary, many politicians expert that the new Negro voting strength will prevent her from getting a majority and thus force her into a runoff against a modernate or liberal opponent.

Negro votes may have a still greater impact in the Black Belt, the rich farming area where a white minority has had political control since Reconstruction.

In Wilcox County, for example, Negroes now have a 1,000-vote majority and are seeking to elect a sheriff and four other nents. Before last year, none of the country's Negroes were allowed to register or vote.

The candidates closed their campaigns today on a light-hearted note. At some rallies "hillbilly" singers twanged their guitars and warmed up the audiences with such old favorites as "Your Cheatin Heart" and "Y'all Come." And at others Negro spirituals, transformed into campaign songs, held the crowds' attention.

There were problems for all concerned, however. Republican leaders in Alabama, where voters are not required to register by party, were urging their followers to shun the Democratic primary — a development that could weaken Mrs. Wallace's showing and enhance the prestige of Representative James D. Martin, a Republican who is waiting in the wings to oppose any gubernatorial candidate the Democrats nominate.

And Stokley Carmichael, the senior field secretary for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in Alabama, has urged voters to stay out of the Democratic primary and participate instead in nominating conventions for independent county political parties.

Other civil rights organizations thought that the student committee's appeal would siphon off large numbers of voters only in Lowndes County. And while the state Republican party chairman, Alfred Goldthwaite, said that the Republican plea would push the voting total in the primary to below 700,000, the state's major newspapers were predicting that between 750,000 and 800,000 would vote tomorrow.

Senator Robert Gilchrist, who led the anti-Wallace forces in the State Legislature, and former Gov. John Patterson, who switched midway in the campaign from a segregationist to a moderate stance on the race question.

Other gubernatorial candidates include former Gov. James Folsom and former Secretary of Agriculture A. W. Todd, who have also made strong pleas for racial unity, and Charles Woods, a multimillionaire businessman, Sherman Powell, a Decatur lawyer, and Eunice I. Gore, who says he is running with "the support of the Lord" and, like Mrs. Wallace is a militant segregationist.

Senator John Sparkman, a former Democratic vice-presidential candidate, faces opposition tomorrow from Frank E. Dixon, a Huntsville space engineer, and John Crommelin, a retired admiral who has run repeatedly in Alabama elections on aplatform of anti-semitism and anti-fluoridation. While neither are taken seriously by Mr. Sparkman's supporters, Republicans will be watching the race closely as a test of Mr. Sparkman's current vote appeal in the state.

If Senator Sparkman's opponents draw more than a token vote, Republican officials almost certainly will attempt to persuade John Grenier, the former state party chairman, or one of their five Congressmen to make the race against the Senator in the general election next November.

Politicians were quietly trying to predict the Negro turnout tomorrow.

According to state registration statistics, Negroes make up only 16 per cent of the total number of eligible voters, but many politicians feel the percentage may be higher because many of the registered white votrs have died or moved away since the registration lists were last purged.

Spokesemen for the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the civil rights leader, estimated thata virtually all of the Negro registrations were valid and that as many as 85 per cent of the registered Negroes would vote. But many observers doubted that the Negro vote would exceed 160,000, or about 70 per cent of the registered Negroes.

Few doubted, however, that the possibility of a heavy Negro vote has given Alabama political oratory a new, and probably permanent, tone of moderation.

"Race baiting and the word 'nigger'," said one Montgomery editor, "have disappeared from Alabama politics."

Trustees of Y.M.C.A. Elect President

The election of Charles W. Buek as president of the board of trustees of the Young Men's Christian Association of the United States for a year that began Sunday was announced yesterday.

Mr. Buek, president of the United States Trust Company of New York, succeeded Reese H. Harris Jr., executive vice president of the Manufacturers Han over Trust Company, who recently was chosen president of the Y.M.C.A. of Greater New York.

The board of trustees is a subsidiary of the national board, the corporate body of the national council, which is the legislative and policy-making body of the Y.M.C.A. movement. The trustees handle investments for local associations in this country and for the Y.M.C.A. retirement fund, which provides retirement benefits for Y.M.C.A. secretaries.

Mr. Buek is a trustee of New York University; a director of the General Reinsurance Corporation and a member of the executive committee of the trust division of the American Bankers Association.

Wallace Campaign Closes

Today, the Wallace primary campaign ended as it began. The Governor, who is barred by the state Constitution from succeeding himself, delivered the major campaign utterances for his wife and said he would serve as chief adviser, handling all major decisions.

If Mrs. Wallace is elected, she would be the third woman to serve as Governor in the United States. Mrs. Nellie Tayloe Ross was elected Governor of Wyoming in 1924, in the same week that Mrs. Miriam Ferguson was elected Governor of Texas.

Mr. Wallace continued his attacks today on Northern newspapers, Senator Robert F. Kennedy, President Johnson, the Federal courts and Communists—charging that all have opposed Alabama's "states' rights."

But he carefully pronounced the word "Negro" and, in contrast to his campaign four years ago, did not mention the word "segregation."

He has kept segregationist support during the campaign, however, by quietly marshaling local resistance to the United States Office of Education's school desegregation guidelines and by ordering a state board to rescind a week-old desegregation program in the state's two mental hospitals.

Segregationists also cheered him throughout the campaign when he vowed that his wife would keep the Confederate flag flying from the State Capitol.

Meanwhile, Attorney General Richmond Flowers, who hopes to get into the runoff with Mrs. Flowers, appealed to Negroes by attending civil rights rallies, pledging to give state jobs to civil rights activists and promising to place the state's Confederate flag in a museum.

Mr. Flowers's aggressive campaign for Negro votes was the first of its kind in modern times by a major Southern candidate. It has stripped most Negro support away from former Representative Carl Elliott, who has the support of organized labor and many of President Johnson's "loyalists" in the state. The two are considered by many to be the frontrunners in the fight to come in second and oppose Mrs. Wallace in a May 31 run off.

Close behind them are state Senator Robert Gilchrist, who led the anti-Wallace forces in the State Legislature, and former Gov. John Patterson, who switched midway in the campaign from a segregationist to a moderate stance on the race question.

Other gubernatorial candidates include former Gov. James Folsom and former Secretary of Agriculture A. W. Wallace Blazes Trail for Callaway?

By SAM HOPKINS
Constitution Political Editor

Some Georgia Democrats fear that Lurleen Wallace's landslide victory in Alabama Tuesday is an indication that Republican Rep. Howard (Bo) Callaway may have a chance of being elected governor.

The political conditions this election year are similar to those in 1964 when Georgia voted Republican for the first time in its history.

Two examples:

More civil rights legislation is up before Congress.

And most political observers believe there is just as much—if not more—anti-Johnson administration feeling in Georgia as there was in 1964.

In addition to this, there is strong emotional opposition to the new federal guidelines for desegregation of schools and teaching staffs.

All this could mean that many Georgians will be voting against Washington in the November general election rather than for a particular candidate for governor.

And it may well be that many voters would feel that voting for a Republican candidate would be a better way of protesting than voting for a Democratic candidate.

Of course, there will be some Democrats in the governor's race who will do everything possible to convince the voters that they despise President Johnson, the federal government, the Democratic-controlled Congress and the whole national Democratic Party.

As an example, former Gov. Ernest Vandiver, one of the likely candidates for governor, already has repeatedly emphasized that he is a Georgia Democrat and has no ties with the national Democratic Party.

It appears that former Gov. Ellis Arnall, another candidate, may be the only one in the race who will refuse to disown the national party.

"You mark my words," one high-level Democratic official declared Wednesday, "Bo Callaway is going to surprise a lot of people this fall. He's running strong in south and middle Georgia, and that Wallace election is a good indication of the anti-Washington feelings in the South."

Insiders say there seems to be no doubt now that Callaway will definitely run for governor and that he is only waiting until after the June 15 deadline for Democratic candidates to qualify before he announces officially.

NO OPPOSITION — State School Supt. Jack Nix apparently is going to get by without opposition. DeKalb County School Supt. Jim Cherry, the only one who could have given him a race, has gotten cold feet and will not run.

5/5/66

Fred David Gray

POLITICS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., May 4—By a curious twist of irony, it was the State of Alabama that helped to pay for the legal education that enabled Fred David Gray to carry on his 10-year battle against the state segregation laws. When Mr. Gray decided he wanted to become a lawyer, no Negroes were admitted to the only state-supported law school, but the state—under the "separate but equal" doctrine—would pay the expenses of those who wished to go to out-of-state institutions.

Man in the News

Mr. Gray went to Western Reserve Law School in Cleveland, but he "never doubted for one minute" that he would not come back to Alabama.

"I wanted to be a lawyer because I felt that if there were more Negro lawyers they could do something about our situation," he recalls.

Associated Press

Seeks offices as "the best qualified man."

Runoff Is Indicated

Today, Mr. Gray stands an excellent chance of becoming next January one of Alabama's first Negro legislators since Reconstruction. After yesterday's Democratic primary, it was at first reported that he had won a clear majority over his two white opponents, but late returns indicated he would face a runoff election May 31. If he wins, among his constituents will be Gov. and Mrs. George C. Wallace.

Mr. Gray was born Dec. 14, 1930, in Montgomery. He was 2 years old when his father died, and his mother supported the family on her earnings of $8 a week as a domestic in white households.

He worked his way through Montgomery's Alabama State College—a state-supported college for Negroes—by earning $25 a week as a district circulation agent with a local newspaper. He entered college hoping to become a minister or a teacher, but as he rode segregated city buses to and from the campus each day he grew increasingly concerned over the Negroes' lack of access to the courts.

Plunging into civil rights litigation almost immediately after completing his law training at Western Reserve, Mr. Gray was the first lawyer Martin Luther King Jr. in civil rights litigation. He still handles Dr. King's legal work in Alabama.

As his role in civil rights litigation took on greater proportions, Mr. Gray found himself involved in legal controversies of his own. Once he was arrested for disorderly conduct when he refused to leave a white waiting room in a Montgomery airport, but the case was never prosecuted.

In 1956 local draft board officials protested that Mr. Gray was using his status as a minister to avoid the draft, and an Alabama Congressman sought an investigation. The controversy died down whne Mr. Gray passed the draft age, but he is still a minister and preaches each Sunday at the New Town Church of Christ in Montgomery.

Fought Districting Case

Without question his biggest case was the Tuskegee gerrymander case of the late nineteen-fifties. When the Alabama Legislature sought to redraw the boundaries of Tuskegee County to exclude Negro voters, Mr. Gray appealed the case to the Supreme Court and won a decision that, in some measure, led to the historic reapportionment decisions of later years.

Married to the former Bernice Hill of Montgomery and the father of four children, Mr. Gray is active in community affairs. He has just completed a term as president of his college alumni association.

He is widely respected by white lawyers and court officials alike for his legal skill, his sense of humor and his indefatigable prosecution of his cause.

"A vote for me," he observes, "will place a voice, not an echo, in the Alabama Legislature, a voice that is unafraid to speak out for my constituents' interest, one that will not be silenced until heard."

Selma Sheriff May Lose to Baker—Ballot Counting Slowed by Inexperience

ers in local elections, breaking into factions to support first one candidate and then another.

The closest local parallel to the anti-Wallace vote yesterday was in Selma where Negroes voted solidly against Sheriff James G. Clark Jr., who, like Governor Wallace, has become a symbol of segregationist oppression to them.

Incomplete returns show that the Negro vote may have unseated Sheriff Clark.

The outcome of his race probably will not be known before tomorrow. Counting of ballots bogged down early today, partly because of the inexperience of Negro election officials manning the polls in Dallas County for the first time. Only a handful of Negroes had ever voted in Dallas County before yesterday.

Wilson Baker, former Public Safety Commissioner in Selma, who was Sheriff Clark's main opponent, led this afternoon by 92 votes with 74 of 80 voting units reported. The remaining units were from Negro neighborhoods where Mr. Baker was likely to be the havy favorite.

One Negro Nominated

The unusually heavy Negro vote in the state, perhaps 150,000 or more, nominated one Negro for the Legislature—to represent Gov. George C. Wallace's home county—and put at least eight others in run-off elections with white opponents for legislative seats and sheriff's officers.

Only one of the five Negro legislative candidates who face runoffs is considered likely to win the Democratic nomination. The three sheriff races are a toss-up, with the outcome apparently dependent on how energetically whites and Negroes get out to vote in the run-off election May 17.

Fred D. Gray, a Tuskegee lawyer who was an attorney for the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. during the Montgomery bus boycott of 1956, was thought last night to have emerged as the only clear winner for a legislative seat. But the official count showed that he was 531 votes short of a majority over his two white opponents.

Negroes were jubilant over the crushing defeat of Al Lingo, a former state public safety director and militant civil rights foe, in his race for sheriff of Jefferson County (Birmingham). With most precincts reported, the incumbent sheriff, Mel Bailey, was leading 9,269 to 8,143.

Complaints from Negroes of discriminatory treatment during yesterday's election. Federal officials tended to minimize them, but said the complaints were being studied.

Dr. Nixon said that he stood in line to vote five hours and that his wife waited five and a half hours. He attributed the delay to a shortage of voting machines and he said he thought white officials had permitted the shortage deliberately.

Dr. King, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, also complained of the way the election was handled in some predominantly Negro counties.

He said many Negroes were given misinformation on voting by white officials. Some Negro illiterates were told to wait until others had voted, he added, and some ballot boxes were found unlocked.

Macon L. Weaver, United States Attorney at Birmingham, said, "We had the same kind of confusion and complaints that you have in any election." He said he doubted that whites had tried to keep Negroes from voting. Many whites also stood in long lines to vote, he said.

Mr. Weaver said voting by illiterates also slowed the balloting. One man stayed in a voting booth 28 minutes, he said.

Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach said in Washington:

"From the information which has reached me, at least in most areas the election was conducted fairly and well and people voted freely and comfortably."

Sheriff Clark raised the possibility that the Dallas County sheriff's race could end in a court contest. He said that at least one ballot box had been left unattended and that one other had been turned in before the votes had been completely counted.

All six remaining boxes were placed in the custody of the probate judge early today when the election officials bogged down in exhaustion and confusion.

Two lesser known candidates received about 1,000 votes, raising the possibility of a Clark-Baker runoff unless the uncounted boxes are heavily for Mr. Baker.

Negroes in Hale, Bullock and Macon Counties led their white opponents in sheriff races, but none apparently won a clear majority. Still incomplete returns indicated that all three would face runoff elections.

A Negro candidate for tax assessor of Bullock County was ahead of two white opponents. He, too, apparently will face a runoff.

Several others among the 54 Negroes running for office in Alabama may yet be among the nominees when the ballots are finally counted and certified. The counting has been slow in some rural areas.

Four Negro candidates for legislative nominations in populous Jefferson County will face whites in runoffs. They have little chance of winning because the total white votes against them yesterday were in a majority.

Another Negro running for the Legislature in Mobile faced the same prospect in the runoff.

Division in Local Contests Is Noted Despite Bloc Action Against Mrs. Wallace

MONTGOMERY, Ala., May 4—Negroes, the newest power in Deep South politics, voted as a bloc yesterday against Mrs. George C. Wallace for Governor in Alabama's Democratic primary.

But they split in voting for candidates in many local elections.

The divisions in local races tended to dispel fears among whites of a black takeover in predominantly Negro counties where the large new Negro voter registration has had a dramatic impact.

Dr. John W. Nixon of Birmingham, state president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, studied the scattered results of the Negro vote today and repeated an oft-stated disclaimer of Negro leaders.

Black Government Denied

"We're not trying to get black government," he said. "We're trying to become part of the democratic process."

If a white officeholder does a "good and just job," Negroes will vote for him, he said.

Negroes who had never before voted in Black Belt counties as Wilcox and Greene apparently decided that some of their white officials had done a "good and just job."

P. C. Lum Jenkins, sheriff of Wilcox County for 27 years, a man known to hundreds of Negroes as Mr. Lummie, defeated his 30-year-old Negro opponent, Walter Calhoun, even though Negroes had a decisive majority on the voting rolls.

Sheriff W. E. Lee, whose family has held the sheriff's office of Greene County since 1923, defeated a 25-year-old Negro civil rights worker, the Rev. Thomas Gilmore. Negro voters outnumber whites 2 to 1 in Greene County.

The election results trickling in today were indecisive in many places, but there were indications that none of the 54 Negro candidates running for local and legislative offices had won a clear victory.

Several will be in runoff elections with white opponents May 17. In some places, it seemed that white candidates were saved from outright defeat only by Negro votes.

Alabama Teaches

5/5/66

Hope springs eternal but realism is more reliable. Minds in the Deep South do not change rapidly. Most Alabama whites want George Wallace. They are the majority. They will have him.

His unsurprising reelection in his wife's name reemphasizes realities that have always been plain.

They follow a classic though curious pattern: Evade state duty to guarantee rights of the humblest; instead, deny rights to the humble so flagrantly that the national government must at last provide even their right to vote; then turn on the national government angrily for meeting the responsibility the state evaded, and thereupon win reelection as a defender of "morality."

It is not a flattering view of the South, as reflected in Wallace's reelection. But it is the real one, and realities, not wishes, prevail.

The national government faced reality when it decided the Wallace South was not going to change itself, and therefore would have to be changed, if the humblest minority was to gain its rights. Forced change is a thoroughly unpleasant experience. The bruises showed in Wallace's margin of victory. But what option was left?

Now the national government has done about all it can do. It has given Southern Negroes the right to vote. It cannot win elections for them.

The realities connected with the use of the vote were seen clearly in the Alabama election. The Negro vote was, and will remain, in forlorn minority on the statewide level for as long as the politics of race is polarized in the Deep South.

The Wallaces will seek to keep it polarized for that is their ticket to power.

For the Negro minority to do the same will be sheerest folly. Only when Negro voters make common cause with moderate white voters can their power be felt. This will take some moderating of the revivalist political attitude. It will take some readiness to go along with something less than all-the-way candidates. "Freedom Now," as a Negro political slogan in the Deep South, will translate at the polls to mean "Wallace Forever."

Polarization of the races is the segregationist's game. Integration of the interests of both races should be the Negro voter's goal.

Dashes Hopes for Moderate Bid Against Mrs. Wallace

5/5/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., May 4 —Mrs. George C. Wallace's landslide victory in the Democratic governorship primary yesterday has dashel Negro hopes that the Republicans conduct a racially moderate campaign against her in November.

United States Representative James D. Martin, the Republican candidate, made it clear today that he would be as vocal as Mrs. Wallace's husband, the Governor, in assailing "federalism" and "socialism"—political synonyms here for enforcel racial desegregation.

Results from 3,371 of the state's 3,654 voting units gave 52.3 per cent of the vote to Mrs. Wallace, a stand-in candidate for her segregationist husband, who is barred by the State Constitution from succeeding himself. She had 399,-024 votes, compared with a combined total of 364,176 for her nine opponents. By winning a clear majority, she averted the necessity for a rnoff election for the nomination.

Republican Outlook Gloomy

Although Republican leaders still insisted they hal a chance to make Mr. Martin the party's first Southern Governor since 1920, John Grenier former state party chairman, conceded that the heavy Wallace vote "gives little reason for optimism."

However, both he and Mr. Martin vigorously denied that Mr. Martin will bow out of the race.

Of the Martin-Wallace race, one civil rights leader, Hosea Williams, said, "Martin is equally rejected by the Negro at this time. Negroes may have to go fishing in November."

The poor showing of Mrs. Wallace's racially moderate opponents in the primary could have ramifications throughout the deep South. It could cause moderate politicians in other states to stiffen their resistance to racial desegregation and make it more difficult for Negroes to find new white champions for their cause.

The Wallace sweep also posed problems for the Federal Government in its campaign to coax Southern states into compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which bans discrimination in schools, hospitals and other facilities that receive Federal aid.

Governor Wallace has already rescinded a desegregation program in the state's mental hospitals and has recently been mobilizing local opposition to Federal school desegregation guidelines.

With a new mandate from the voters, the Governor can be expected to step up his opposition and thus force the Federal Government either to back down or cut off Federal funds in a state whose expenditures for education and hospitals already rank far below the national average.

Federal officials would like to avoid cutting off funds to Alabama because this would penalize Negroes and white moderates as well as die-hard segregationists. But failure to take action could encourage defiance elsewhere in the south.

Alabama Negro leaders consoled themselves by citing local primary results that put Negroes into runoffs May 31 against white opponents in a number of races for the State Legislature and for sheriff. The results were still in doubt in many of the 54 races in which Negroes opposed whites for local office.

Although many Republicans were stunned by the magnitude of the Wallace victory, they said that United States Senator John J. Sparkman had showed surprising weakness among voters and immediately began looking for a Republican to oppose him.

Grenier Considers Race

One possibility was Mr. Grenier, who said he had been "seriously considering the race for a month" and was "greatly encouraged" by Mr. Sparkman's "failure to make a good showing against three opponents."

Mr. Sparkman, the Democratic Vice-Presidential nominee in 1962 on Adlai E. Stevenson's ticket, won renomination, collecting 292,729 votes against 232,731 for his three opponents. They were Adm. John Crommelin, retired; Frank Dixon, a Huntsville space engineer, and Mrs. Frank Stewart, widow of a former State Superintendent of Education.

About 200,000 voters did not cast ballots in the Senate race, another encouraging sign for Mr. Grenier.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., head of the Southern Leadership Conference, siad that his aides would file formal complaints with the Justice Department because of the "great question and serious suspicion" abou the handling of elections in several counties in which Negro candidates were known to have been defeated.

"In many areas such as Green Dallas andC hoctaw Counties, they (Negroes) were given misinformation about voting," the civil rights said. "Several counties reported ballot boxes that were not locked and in Choctaw, in one precinct, ballots were stacked up on a table."

A spokesman for the Justice Department said that Federal voting observers, the first in the state since the Reconstruction, were checking complaints in Dallas and Greene Counties.

"It seems obvious that white Alabamians were desperately grasping for a way to return to the old days of white supremacy," Dr. King said of the governorship race. "But the overwhelming turnout of Negro voters and the number of candidates in the runoffs throughout the state indicate that there is a new day in Alabama."

Because returns were still coming in, civil rights leaders and politicians were uncertain how many of the state's 235,000 registered Negroes had voted. But it appeared that at least 150,000 had cast their ballots. And the total could be substantially higher.

Wish 8 per cent of the voting units yet to report, Attorney General Richmond M. Flowers, who had the support of Negro political organizations, came in second in the governorship race. Many politicians thought almost all of Mr. Flower's votes were Negro.

Because of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, some 122,000 Negroes, or more than half the total Negro registration in the state, registered to vote in the Democratic primary for the first time in their lives.

Nixon, in the South, Bids G. O. P. Drop Race Issue

By DAVID S. BRODER
Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., May 6 — Former Vice President Richard M. Nixon said today that there was "no future in the race issue" for either party in the South.

He urged Southern Republica to drop the issue from their campaign arsenal, but said national party leaders could not "dictate" an antisegregation stand to the states.

In a news conference prior to a speech at a fund-raising dinner for the Mississippi Republican party, Mr. Nixon. The party's candidate in 1960, also called on Democratic opponents of the Vietnam war to grant the President "a pause in their criticisms."

He said the attacks on Amer can policies in Vietnam by Senator J. W. Fulbright of Arkansas and other Democrats were encouraging the enemy and prolonging the war.

Appearance Upsets Liberals

Mr. Nixon told newsmen that the suggestion by former Senator Barry Goldwater, the party's candidate in 1964, that Mr. Fulbright resign as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee "would get the desired results." It might be "mor realistic" to hope, he said, that just as the Administration agreed to a pause in the bombing of North Vietnam last winter, so the Democrats who had urged such a pause "might give the President a pause in their criticisms now."

Mr. Nixon's scheduled appearance here has been a source of controversy in the national Republican party, with some liberal Republicans charging he is raising money to aid "segregationist candidates."

Asked about this by a local newsman, Mr. Nixon said:

"I will go to any state in the country to campaign for a strong two-party system, whether or not I agree with the local Republicans on every issue."

Then, in replies to other questions, he clearly distinguished his own civil rights views from those of his hosts.

"I am opposed to any so-called segregationist plank in a Republican platform," he declared. "I would fight it in the national Republican platform and speak against it in any state I appear in."

Mississippi Republicans in 1964 adopted a platform endorsing "segregation of the races" as "absolutely essential to harmonious racial relations."

Proposal Called 'Unwise'

Two liberal Republican organizations last month urged the Republican National Committee to require state parties with such clauses in their platforms to repeal them "without delay."

Mr. Nixon said he thought the recommendation was "unrealistic and unwise."

The national Republican party, he said, should state its own support for civil rights forthrightly and try to convince state parties to agree.

"It cannot dictate to them," he insisted.

In asnwer to another question, Mr. Nixon iterated his support of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, including the latter's sanction of voting by illiterates.

He declined to take a position on President Johnson's recent request for new legislation to prohibit discrimination in housing. Mr. Nixon said he had discussed the proposal with the Senate Republican leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, earlier today and "he said he saw significant constitutional problems."

"I will not make any statement on the bill as long as my party leadership in the House and Senate is still evaluating it," Mr. Nixon said.

Mr. Dirksen said last week he believed the bill, aimed at outlawing racial and religious discrimination in the sale and the rental of private housing, was "plainly unconstitutional."

There have been indications, however, that some influential House Republicans may support it.

Urges Bombing North Vietnam

Mr. Nixon also repeated his previous calls for astep-up in American bombing of military targets in North Vietnam and the closing of the port of Haiphong.

"The present Administration," he said, "seems resigned to a long war which would cost us hundreds of thousands of American casualties and destroy the political stability" of South Vietnam in the process.

Withdrawal or defeat in Vietnam, he said, "would mean the beginning of the end for freedom in Asia."

Predicts Gains for Party

WASHINGTON, May 6 (AP) —Mr. Nixon predicted today that Republicans this fall "are going to make bigger gains in the House, in the Senate and for Governor across the nation than in any year since 1946."

He told several thousand Republican women workers, in a telephoned address from Newark, that this year's candidates were the best he has seen in two decades, and th at the party as a whole showed "unity such as I have not seen in many years."

The Democrats, Mr. Nixon continued, "are hopelessly divided over Vietnam and they are divided in the contest over heir apparency."

He said the Democrats were actually two "competing parties in Washington today, one headed by Bobby Kennedy and the oth er by Hubert Humphrey"—the New York Senator and the Vice President.

GOP Executive Board Gets Negro Member

Atlantan's Choice a Frank Bid For Support for Rep. Callaway

By CHARLES POU
Atlanta Journal Political Editor

MACON, Ga., May 7—Georgia Republicans Saturday elected an Atlanta Negro to the party's executive committee in a frank bid to entice Negro voters to support Rep. Howard (Bo) Callaway for governor—if he runs.

Dr. C. Clayton Powell, an optometrist and one of few Georgia Negroes to support Barry Goldwater in 1964, defeated Mims Wilkinson of Decatur for the post of parliamentarian by a vote of 320-229. Wilkinson had been the choice of the nominating committee. Dr. Powell was proposed from the floor.

Among others, John Maddox of Wayne County endorsed the Atlanta optometrist as a means to get Negroes back into the party—and specifically to help Callaway.

"It is imperative that we have a broad base," he said. "We must let the people know."

SEN. DAN MacINTYRE of Atlanta put it even blunter. "We know that Dr. Powell is a Bo Callaway man," he declared.

Dr. Powell was nominated by Bill Dowda of Atlanta, a possible GOP candidate for Congress in the 5th District. Mr. Dowda spoke of the optometrist's "courage" in backing Goldwater in 1964.

An earlier attempt to get a Negro on the executive committee failed when Dr. Charles Price of DeKalb County, a political science professor at Atlanta University, was defeated by Ed Peavey of Waycross for the post of assistant treasurer by a vote of 338-238. Dr. Price was nominated by Sen. Frank Miller of DeKalb, and again the pitch was made that a Negro was needed on the executive committee to boost the chances of Callaway.

There have been no Negroes on the party's executive committee since the take over of the state organization by Gold-urged Rep. Callaway to run for governor. He again indicated he is going to, before leaving for Viet Nam with a congressional committee, and the platform sounded a lot like one he would endorse as a candidate.

Nationally deplored were "the questionable programs" on poverty, anything less than military, economic and political victories in Viet Nam, and "wrongs done to the equitable division of powers as outlined in the constitution by the current administration in Washington."

IN A SPEECH to delegates Friday and at a press conference, Rep. Callaway said the State Highway Department, which long has been administered by Mr. Gillis, will be an issue if he runs.

So, in effect, did the platform.

A panel asserted the party favors "a highway department system responsive to the needs of the people, implemented by qualified professionals, dedicated to the sole purpose of providing better roads for Georgia, and devoid of outside influences."

There were several bids here for a return to the party of Negro voters. But there were only a smattering of Negro delegates in the audience.

The party chairman was authorized to appoint a committee which would seek ways and means of wooing support from Negroes, lost in the Goldwater campaign of 1964. A plank called for "good-will, tolerance, and common sense" in race relations — and keeping them out of politics.

"All laws should be interpret-trying to do and it's time somebody tipped off the people," he said.

State Rep. G. Paul Jones was elected State Executive Committee chairman without opposition at the convention. Other officers elected were Frank Troutman of Augusta, first vice chairman; state Sen. Fletcher Thompson of East Point, second vice chairman; Mrs. Carolyn Brooks of Dalton, vice chairwoman; Mrs. W. C. Calhoun of Augusta, secretary; Tom Addison of Atlanta, treasurer; and Mrs. Connie Russell of Atlanta, assistant secretary.

There have been no Negroes on the party's executive committee since the take over of the state organization by Goldwater supporters in 1964.

The delegates adopted a new party platform which appeared aimed at making targets of LBJ nationally and Jim Gillis locally in the coming governor's race.

The Executive Committee decided to open qualifying to candidates at noon, May 23.

Meeting after the convention, the committee set the dates and qualifying fees for candidates. Qualifying will close June 15.

Fees included $1,500 to run for governor, $1,500 for Congress, $1,000 for all other state house offices, $400 for state legislative seats and $750 for superior court judge and solicitor general posts.

The state convention earlier urged Rep. Callaway to run for governor. He again indicated he is going to, before leaving for Viet Nam with a congressional committee, and the platform sounded a lot like one he would endorse as a candidate.

Nationally deplored were "the questionable programs" on poverty, anything less than military, economic and political victories in Viet Nam, and "wrongs done to the equitable division of powers as outlined in the constitution by the current administration in Washington."

"All laws should be interpreted and applied on an equal basis," said the platform, "without regard to race, creed or national origin."

House Republican leader Gerald R. Ford of Michigan, in a speech prepared for delivery to the convention Saturday, blamed the Johnson administration for the inflation threat and said the only solution is to elect more GOP congressmen.

HE SAID A MORE evenly balanced Congress would be better for the nation and would stem from what he said were excessive spending programs that the people did not want.

"The big spenders have been running the show on Capitol Hill . . . but the 'savers' have them scared — or maybe they're beginning to hear the voice of the people," he told the Georgians.

Rep. Ford predicted his party would gain 40 congressional seats in the fall elections.

And when it does, ". . . this nation's course will change."

He said the balance of power in Congress — which now is 2-1 in favor of the Democrats — will shift "to those who would turn this country away from free spending . . . (that is) eroding the hard-earned dollars of American workers."

The GOP national leader said President Johnson is trying to fool the American public by "sticking the Viet Nam war in his pocket and saying, 'Now don't you all worry about this war. I'll take care of it.' "

The Johnson forces are trying to condition the people for another tax increase this year, "this time a direct bite of their paychecks," said Rep. Ford.

"It's obvious what the Johnson-Humphrey administration is trying to do and it's time somebody tipped off the people," he said.

Arnall Would Hire Negro Troopers

AC 5/8/66

By WILLIAM O. SMITH

Former Gov. Ellis Arnall, who is a candidate again this year, promised Saturday that he will hire Negroes as state troopers if he's elected.

Mr. Arnall, appearing at a statewide meeting of Negro Democrats here, also said he refused to speak on the same platform with Negro Julian Bond because he didn't want Mr. Bond's views associated as his own by implication.

"I do not think Julian Bond acted prudently when he said what he did," Mr. Arnall said. "I thought he was wrong."

Mr. Arnall, answering a question posed by Negro civil rights leader Hosea Williams, said he feels every person has a right to speak his views. "I didn't fall out with him (Mr. Bond) for that," he said.

MR. BOND, an Atlanta Negro, was denied his seat in the Georgia House because he endorsed a statement saying "Vietnamese are murdered because the United States is pursuing an aggressive policy in violation of international law."

Mr. Arnall appeared at a meeting of the Georgia Association of Citizens Democratic Clubs and got the best reception of six candidates for state office who spoke before the organization. One candidate — Labor Commissioner Ben Huiet — did not appear but sent representatives.

Others appearing were Clarke Rep. Randall Bedgood, a candidate for lieutenant governor; Comp. Gen. Jimmy Bentley; Fulton Superior Judge Jeptha C. Tanksley, a possible candidate for governor; Sam Caldwell, who will oppose Mr. Huiet, and Agriculture Commissioner Phil Campbell.

About 125 Negroes from throughout the state attended the all-day meeting at the Butler Street YMCA.

Among actions taken was adoption of a resolution asking politicians in Georgia to stop resistance to new federal guidelines speeding up school desegregation so integration will occur more smoothly.

IN HIS STATEMENTS, Mr. Arnall said he doesn't think Negroes ought to be hired as troopers unless they're qualified. But he said one-third of Georgians are Negroes and the State Highway Patrol "ought to embrace a broad spectrum of our people."

In a statement opening the meeting, Fulton Negro Sen. Leroy R. Johnson cautioned politicians that "Georgia is not an Alabama" and said a coalition of "responsible" Negro voters and the "best element of the white community" will elect Georgia's next governor.

Sen. Johnson said he is "afraid that some politicians are miscalculating the signs of the times."

"They are erroneously equating and comparing the politics of Alabama with the politics of Georgia," he said.

"Georgia is not an Alabama." He said this coalition of voters has provided "reasonably good government" in Atlanta, Macon, Savannah, Augusta and Brunswick and will determine the governor in 1966.

"To those politicians who in the 1960s fear talking to the Negro in public, or fear meeting with Negroes in public, I should think that they might have some scruples about receiving his votes in privacy," Sen. Johnson said.

"In other words, it would be difficult to support those politicians who want to romance the Negro at night or behind closed doors, or in privacy, and divorce him in public.

"We do not at this moment seek a public wedding with any politician, because we recognize the reality of politics, and we resent deeply a shotgun courtship."

In their questions to candidates, the Negroes seemed most concerned with whether more state jobs are going to be opened to Negroes in the future.

Mr. Bentley, who said he will formally announce in a few days his intentions to seek re-election, admitted his office now employs only four Negroes in about 110 employes.

But he said he has no doubt that other Negroes will be hired as time passes.

ANSWERING A question, he said the four Negroes hired are all college graduates, but that this is not a requirement. He said most of his employes must be highly educated, however, because his office enforces more regulations than all other state agencies combined.

One Negro in the audience complained that "one of our problems is that they want all of us to be Jackie Robinsons."

Judge Tanksley said that if he's elected governor "no jobs will belong exclusively to one group of citizens."

He said state personnel will be hired during his administration on a basis of merit. If a person is qualified he should get the job whether he's white or Negro, he said.

Rep. Bedgood, an announced candidate for lieutenant governor, replied to a question that the new federal guidelines on education "are not arbitrary."

He said all but 15 school systems have indicated they'll implement the guidelines and he supports them, too.

ASKED ABOUT the House's refusal to seat elected Mr. Bond, Rep. Bedgood said he favored seating Mr. Bond and said so at the time.

In a formal statement, Rep. Bedgood said, "It is time for the responsible people of Georgia of all races to show maturity and with it some degree of intelligent thinking.

"Let me caution you to consider seriously the recent elections in our neighboring state to the west," he said. "Remember that only an invisible line separates our two states. Animosity and militant action is not the answer at this moment or any other moment in Georgia history."

Texas Results Confirm Alabama Point: Liberals Still Face Long, Uphill Fight

POLITICS

By DAVID S. BRODER

News Analysis

HOUSTON, May 8—Yesterday's Texas election results confirmed the lesson of the Alabama primary that free access to the polls is no guarantee of victories for leberal in the South.Texas liberal and labor forces challenging the supremacy of Gov. John B. Connally's conservative Democratic establishment suffered almost as sharp a disappointment as the opponents of Gov. George C. Wallace and his wife, Lurleen, did in Alabama last Tuesday. In both states, the liberals hadw pinned their hopes on Federal legislation and Federal court decisions that expanded the electorate to include many new voters from low-income and minority groups.

In Alabama, the number of Negro voters doubled to 235,000 after Federal registrars had been sent in under the Voting Rights Act of 1965. In Texas, a Federal court decision against the state poll tax permitted the free registration during March of 630,000 new voters, a 25 per cent jump.

But in the first elections held in these expanded constituences, the Governors, employing their political organizations, easily overcame the liberals' challenge.

The results were viewed as meaning that the political transition of the South, which observers have said for years was inevitable, are likely to come about far more slowly than some expected.

Two Situations Differ

The issues and personalities of the Alabama and Texas primaries were far from identical. Race questions, which dominated the Alabama voting, have not been a major factor in Tex politics in many years.

But in both states, liberal-labor forces attempting to bring the state Democratic parties into closer ideological agreementn with the national Democratic party were repulsed. As a consequence, the daz stillseems distant when Southern politics is realigned on the national pattern of competition between a predominantly liberal Democratic party and a predominantly conservative Republican party.

True, there werre scattered victories for liberal and minority group candidates for the Legislatures of both states, partly as a result of the expanded electorate and party as a result of reapportionment.

But in the more important statewide battles—for the governorship nomination in Alabama and for the attorney generalship nomination and control of the Democratic organization in Texas — Democrats tinged with the philosophy of the Great Society were beaten by Democrats who, on one issue or another, said they would "stand up" against the Federal Government.

The results can only be viewe as disquieting for President Johnson and other national Democrats. They are probably a mixed blessing for the Republicans.

For Mr. Johnson and other Democratic party leaders, the returns constitute a renewed warning that the once-solid South is melting from under them.

Governor Wallace is likely to find encouragement in his wife's victory for another foray into the Presidential primaries in 1968. He would probably exploit arace issue that the President's proposed open housing legislation has made increasingly sensitive in the North.

Tower's Bid Strengthened

In his home state of Texas, Mr. Johnson faces a stronger possibility of a second-term victory by Senator John G. Tower, a Republican. Liberal Democrats' dislike for Mr. Tower's conservative Democratic opponent, Attorney General Waggoner Carr, was indicated by the fact that his little known opponent received 20 per cent of the vote.

Democrats will present an all-conservative slate for statewide office in November, unless the labor-backed candidate Franklin Spears, can overcome long odds against his nomination for Attorney General in the run-off primary.

Without Mr. Spears, liberal Democrats would have almost no special reason to vote in November; their "going fishing" is Mr. Tower's best hope for Nor is he the only Republican in the South encouraged by the last week's demonstration that thousands of nominal Democrats will favor the candidate most conspicuous in his opposition to the domestic policies of the Johnson Administration.

Republicans across the South are gearing their campaigns to capture that prevailing conservative sentiment by hanging the Great Society label on even the most anti-Administration Southern Democrats.

The pleasant prospect of additional Republican victories in the South is marred for national Republican leaders by the fact that conservatism in several Southern states is inextricably interwoven with last-ditch segregationism.

Jim Martin and the Negro Vote

By ROWLAND EVANS and ROBERT NOVAK

Washington.

ON THE day before the Alabama Democratic primary election, Republican Rep. James D. Martin inserted in the Congressional Record remarks condemning an abortive transfer of patients between two mental hospitals in Alabama — one white and one Negro — to meet federal desegregation guidelines.

This "outrage," stormed Martin, constituted an "inhumane act of using mental patients as pawns in the game of winning votes of minority groups which seems to be the sole occupation of this (Johnson) administration." He then inserted in the Record an editorial praising Gov. George Wallace for intervening against the proposed transfer of mental patients.

TRAILING

Such an outburst would scarcely be exceptional, coming from a Southern congressman, save for the fact that Martin will be the Republican nominee for governor. His foe: Democratic nominee Lurleen Wallace, stand-in for her husband (who is barred from succeeding himself).

What's more, Lurleen's breathtaking victory in the Democratic primary shows that Wallace has cornered the hardcore segregationist vote in Alabama.

Thus, Martin, in order to win, must get Alabama's Negro vote. Ironically, then, Jim Martin's political future depends on "the game of winning votes of minority groups."

Until Tuesday, Martin seemed a solid favorite to be elected governor.

A secret poll conducted about a month ago by a highly respected pollster showed Martin running ahead of every Democratic possibility — including Mrs. Wallace. Of all the Democrats, she was the only one to show up well, trailing Martin by only 52 per cent to 48 per cent.

But the Wallace showing last Tuesday surprised everybody as an exhibit of the governor's grip on rural white Alabama.

Thus, even granting that 25 to 30 per cent of the state's white voters (mainly in the big cities and suburbs) are now dyed - in - the - wool Republicans, Martin needs heavy, unified Negro backing to win.

Despite continuing his play for the segregationist vote, Martin is a nimble politician who shows significant signs of flexibility.

For instance, as recently as last summer he was the only Alabama Republican congressman who privately described himself as a segregationist. Now he bridles when the term is applied to him.

More to the point, Martin has been trying clandestinely to build a base of Negro support — carefully concealing it from his segregationist support.

Yet Martin needs more than a clandestine movement to win Negro votes. The all-Negro Black Panther party (sponsored by the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee) urged Negroes to boycott the Democratic primary.

GRAB-BAG

But even beyond the extremist fringe of the civil rights movement, there will be solid advice to Negroes to stand clear of the Martin-Wallace showdown.

For instance, Dr. John Nixon, of Birmingham, the state NAACP leader — an activist but no extremist — believes the Alabama Negro should not give his vote to a candidate who does not ask for it.

If Alabama Republicans could bring themselves to make such a request, the reward might transcend the efforts. Sen. John Sparkman's renomination on Tuesday with approximately two-thirds of the vote against a grab-bag collection of three foes was not impressive.

Thus, a Republican candidate of the stature of Winton (Red) Blount, the Montgomery construction magnate, might have a chance against Sparkman.

Blount, who as state Chamber of Commerce president last year took a stand against Wallace racism, might also add a touch of moderation to Martin's candidacy.—(c1966).

Nixon Tips Callaway's Hand On Georgia Governor Race?

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, May 9 — Former Vice President Richard M. Nixon has already put Rep. Howard H. (Bo) Callaway of Pine Mountain in the governor's race in Georgia.

Nixon, in a copyright article for North American Newspaper Alliance, said Republicans should support "fiscal sanity and economic conservatism in Southern statehouses" and added:

"Alabama and Georgia are presented with special opportunities this year in the candidacies of James Martin and Bo Callaway, who have surrendered safe seats in the Congress to run for governor.

"Their election would do for Alabama and Georgia what the election of Republican governors in recent years has done for Pennsylvania and Ohio."

The Republican Congressional Committee Newsletter, out Monday, used most of the Nixon article as editorial comment, but omitted the reference to Rep. Callaway and to Rep. Martin, the Gadsden, Ala., congressman who apparently will oppose Mrs. Lurleen Wallace for governor in November.

NIXON, who was the losing GOP candidate for president in 1960 and for governor of California in 1962, said the South cannot build a two-party system "by simply sending Republicans to the national capital on national issues."

He said it must win in courthouses, legislatures and statehouses. The party of the future, he said, "cannot be built upon a foundation of federal handouts."

Richard Nixon

Rep. Callaway

"The Republican party in the South ought to state to the people of the South: Ask not what Washington can do for you, but what you can do for yourselves," Nixon wrote.

The former vice president also declared that the Southern GOP "must not go prospecting for the fool's gold of racist votes."

"Southern Republicans must not climb aboard the sinking ship of racial injustice," he said. "They should let Southern Democrats sink with it, as they have sailed with it.

"Any Republican victory that would come of courting racists, black or white, would be a defeat for our future in the South, and our party in the nation. It would be a battle won in a lost cause."

Callaway Eyes Negro Blocs, Byrd Charges

Former Lt. Gov. Garland Byrd says Republican Rep. Howard Callaway has softened his civil rights stand and is actively "pursuing the Negro bloc vote."

Mr. Byrd, a potential Democratic candidate for governor this year, claimed in an interview Sunday Rep. Callaway has "departed from the image he was successful with" when he soundly defeated the former lieutenant governor for Congress in 1964.

Rep. Callaway is now considered a likely GOP contender for governor.

MR. BYRD SAID the GOP congressman promised to introduce a bill to repeal the 1964 Civil Rights Act. "He hadn't been elected more than 30 days until he apologized for making that statement," Mr. Byrd commented.

"I also noticed an absence in the news reports of the Georgia Republican party convention, which was under his direction and control, of taking any position on the school desegregation guidelines," the Reynolds attorney added. "It would be interesting to know what his attitude is with regard to that."

Mr. Byrd said he is completing legal work on a suit to test federal school desegregation guidelines and will file it later this week in Taylor County Superior Court.

Grand Dragon Is Against Him, Too

POLITICS AC 5/9/66

The grand dragon of Georgia's Ku Klux Klan said Sunday he would get out and campaign for Leroy Johnson, "the very capable Negro senator of Atlanta," if he were running against Fifth District Rep. Charles L. Weltner next fall.

Speaking on a question and answer session on WQXI, Calvin Craig said:

"I assure you that I would get out and campaign for him (Johnson) because I feel that he's an honorable person of his community, an honorable person of his race, and I certainly feel that he would make a more capable servant of the people of the Fifth District than Mr. Weltner because I think Mr. Weltner has used that office strictly as a race-hating organization against the Ku Klux Klan."

Asked if the Klan would actively campaign against Rep. Weltner this summer, Craig replied: "We shall do all in our power . . . not as an organization because we're not a political organization . . . as individuals to defeat Mr. Weltner."

"We just hope we can get a good man to run against him this time," the grand dragon said.

Craig said he would like to question Rep. Weltner about one of his supporters whose name was on his "letterhead of literature that he put out in the last political campaign." Craig said the man was a member of the Civil Rights Congress which has been "identified by the attorney general of the United States as a Communist front organization."

Thompson Calls Weltner A 'Bigot' in Race Issue Spat

State Sen. Fletcher Thompson of East Point, a second vice chairman of the Republican party of Georgia, charged Sunday that Rep. Charles L. Weltner is being a "bigot" and a "racist" when he says that the Republican party exploited the race issue in the 1964 presidential election.

Weltner, the keynote speaker Saturday at a meeting of the Georgia Young Democrats, said that the Republican party carried the state for the first time in history because of "the clever exploitation of the race issue by the Republican party in Georgia and throughout the South."

Weltner charged that Republicans were employing a new form of racism and said, "The old demagogues would mount the stump and shout 'nigger.' The new Republicans talk about 'crime in the streets,' subsidized illegitimacy,' and 'Washington dictatorship.' "

DEMAGOGUE TAG

Thompson, in a statement to The Constitution, said that Weltner has shown himself to be "nothing more than a demogogue." "It is obvious," said Thompson, "that Weltner is attempting to exploit for his own political gain the racial issue by making unfounded charges against the Republican Party in an attempt to stir up the Negro community."

The Republican Party, according to Thompson, has made it clear that it will not condone or exploit racism for political gain.

CROSS RACE LINES

The state senator said that, "Weltner knows he must exploit the Negro voter if he is to remain in power. Because of this he is attempting to bind Republican concern over the crime rate as 'racist'."

Thompson said Republican statements on these matters cross racial lines and are of concern to all Americans.

"I expect," said Thompson, "that the Negro citizen wants most to be considered as an individual with the same rights, desires and needs as everyone else and that he is soon going to grow tired of being used as a pawn by politicians such as Weltner."

TALMADGE UPSETS GEORGIA POLITICS

POLITICS

Other Candidates Weigh His Interest in Governorship

5/20/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, May 19 — Senator Herman E. Talmadge's entry into Georgia's governorship race has completely altered the state political situation leaving Republicans and anti-Talmadge Democrats in disarray.

Until the Senator's announcement yesterday that he would like to return to the state as Governor, both groups had been predicting victory in the race.

But today, United States Rep. Howard B. Callaway, the leading Republican contender for Governor, would not say whether he was still in or was dropping out of the campaign.

Former Gov. Ellis Arnall, an anti-Talmadge Democrat, said he was "definitely" still a candidate. But some of his close associates said that Mr. Arnall was in only because he was not completely convinced that Senator Talmadge would go through with his plan to quit the Senate.

At least one of Senate Talmadge's closet allies, State Controller James Bentley, agreed that the Senator's plans "are not final."

"The Senator merely moved in to fill the breech when Ernest Vandiver got out of the race," said Mr. Bentley, a possible gubernatorial candidate himself if Senator Talmadge does not run.

Qualified Candidacy

Mr. Vandiver, a former Governor, withdrew from the race yesterday because of a heart ailment. Senator Talmadge immediately announced that he had "reached the conclusion that I can best serve my state and its people in these trying times as Governor rather than continuing in the United States Senate."

The Senator qualified his announcement, however, by saying that he would like to hear from his constituents as to whether he should remain in the Senate or run for Governor.

Already, according to a Talmadge associate, bankers, textile mill officials, and other corporate executives are telling him that the state cannot afford to lose his 10 years' seniority in the Senate and in the Senate Finance Committee, where he is fourth in order of seniority from the chairmanship.

But most key Talmadge supporters are saying that the 52-year-old Senator is determined to return to the state as Governor. They said he was tired of Washington and also wanted gun speculating upon who Senator Talmadge might appoint to his Senate seat next year if he is elected Governor.

Among those figuring in speculation were Judge Griffin Bell of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, State Controller Bentley, Mr. Vandiver, and the present Governor, Carl E. Sanders.

Australia Curbs Hallucinogens

CANBERRA, Australia—Australia is to introduce strict controls on the import of a number of drugs that produce hallucination, among them are LSD and Mescaline, the Australian News and Information Bureau reports. The Minister for Customs, Senator Kenneth Anderson, said that these and other hallucinogens are not to be brought into Australia without his written consent.

mediately announced that he had "reached the conclusion that I can best serve my state and its people in these trying times as Governor rather than continuing in the United States Senate."

The Senator qualified his announcement, however, by saying that he would like to hear from his constituents as to whether he should remain in the Senate or run for Governor.

Already, according to a Talmadge associate, bankers, textile mill officials, and other corporate executives are telling him that the state cannot afford to lose his 10 years' seniority in the Senate and in the Senate Finance Committee, where he is fourth in order of seniority from the chairmanship.

But most key Talmadge supporters are saying that the 52-year-old Senator is determined to return to the state as Governor. They said he was tired of Washington and also wanted to head off Republican growth in the state and to defeat Representative Callaway and Mr. Arnall.

Representative Callaway, who is 37 years old, was elected in 1964 as Georgia's first Republican Congressman since Reconstruction, and Senator Talmadge's supporters see him as a major threat to Democratic control in the state.

Belittles the Threat

Yesterday, however, in discussing the Republican challenge in Georgia, Senator Talmadge referred to the Republican Representative as "Cab Callaway" — apparently in an effort to indicate that he considers him no more serious a threat than the Negro singer by that name.

Senator Talmadge's concern over Mr. Arnall is nearly a quarter of a century old. It began in 1942 when Governor Arnall defeated the Senator's late father, Eugene — a suspenders-tugging orator and segregationist—in a bid for a fourth term as Governor.

His concern increased four years later when his father died after having won an election to succeed Mr. Arnall. The Senator persuaded the Legislature to elect him Governor and then took over the state capitol with the assistance of armed guards.

Gov. Arnall refused to relinguish the governorship, and continued to administer the state from his law offices. He charged that the Lietenant Governor-elect and not Mr. Talmadge was the proper heir to the governorship.

After the court set aside Mr. Talmadge's election by the Legislature, he won a special statewide election in 1948 and served until 1955. Throughout his administration, he assailed Mr. Arnall, who had won a national reputation as a liberal by abolishing the state's poll tax, revamping the state's school system, and taking a moderate position on the race issue.

Change in Talmadge

Senator Talmadge, in contrast, was a white supremacist as Governor and during most of his years in the Senate was considered one of that body's most forceful segregationists.

Recently, however, he has begun wooing the state's steadily increasing Negro vote.

Although the 59-year-old Mr. Arnall has led the anti-Talmadge forces in the state since stepping down as Governor in 1947, he had not sought an elective office since then.

ALABAMA IS ISSUE IN FLORIDA'S VOTE

Gov. Burns Asks His State to 'Follow Lead' of Another

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., May 19—"Follow the lead of Alabama" has become a frequent plea of Gov. Haydon Burns of Florida as he stumps the state in the closing days of the second Democratic primary campaign.

He has got applause and cheers from audiences in north Florida with a line about Alabama and also when he mentions Mrs. George C. Wallace, the Democratic nominee for Governor of Alabama.

Mr. Burns has been barnstorming Florida during the last week of the campaign and he has found enthusiasm that was previously lacking. He has placed his hopes for re-election in what he calls the twin issues of "Bobby Kennedy" and the "paid Negro bloc vote."

The Governor, who is currently serving a two-year term, turned to the race issue last week after avoiding it almost completely in the first primary, which ended May 3.

The Governor got 35 per cent of the vote in that election while Robert King High, the Mayor of Miami, who finished second, got 33 per cent. A third major candidate, Scott Kelly of Lakeland, received 32 per cent of the vote.

The second primary election is May 24, and Governor Burns has said privately that he probably is behind. Publicly, he has said, he will be defeated only if his supporters fail to get out the vote on election day.

Wallace Tactics Used

The Burns campaign has been using some of the political tactics that worked for Mrs. Wallace.

Bands of musicians are sent ahead to gather crowds for the Governor, who travels in a plane that is too big to land at some of the small-town airports.

Once on the platform, Mr. Burns charges that Mr. High's campaign has been directed by Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York.

"Bobby High will never be Governor of Florida and Bobby Kennedy will never be President of the United States," the Governor said. He says that Senator Kennedy hopes to control the Florida delegation to the 1968 national Democratic convention by controlling Mayor High.

This "outside influence" he says was rejected in Alabama "and will be rejected in Florida."

"The Miami Mayor is in the runoff only because of the paid Negro bloc vote," was a phrase he used in every speech this week.

The Governor has not commented on newspaper analyses showing that in several large counties he got as many or more Negro votes in the first primary than Mr. High did.

Mr. Burns's strategy has been to appeal to the 320,000 voters who cast their ballots for Mr. Kelly on May 3. Mr. Kelly generally was considered to be the most conservative of the three major candidates.

United Press International

CONFIDENT OF VOTE: Gov. Haydon Burns of Florida. He indicated he expected to win renomination in second state Democratic primary next week.

The Governor has had some difficulty in attracting support after asserting on May 5 that Mr. Kelly had offered to endorse the Burns campaign for $500,000.

Mr. Kelly called the Governor's charge "the biggest political lie ever told in Florida" and set aside plans to rest in the runoff campaign and began traveling and speaking with Mayor High.

Mr. Burns's practice of making spur-of-the-moment charges has caused concern within his campaign organization. On one occasion, he interpolated into a speech that he did poorly in Tampa in the first primary because he had been supported by Tampa's Mayor Nick Nuccio.

The Governor tried to soothe Nuccio supporters later by explaining that he meant that Mayor Nuccio was so involved in local political campaigns that supporters of candidates proposed by Mr. Nuccio voted against Governor Burns in protest.

Governor Burns, who is 54 years old, was Mayor of Jacksonville for 16 years before becoming Governor. He has not appeared to enjoy campaigning this year.

In his first 16 months as Governor, Mr. Burns proposed very few changes. He postponed action on two major projects that had been before the Legislature for several years, revision of state tax laws and rewriting of the state Constitution.

Voters last November defeated by a 2-to-1 vote a proposal that the state borrow $300-million to build new highways. Mr. Burns campaigned vigorously for the bond issue, and its defeat was regarded as a severe blow to his prestige.

Mr. Burns said that he considered the continued expansion of the state university and junior college system to be the major accomplishment of his first year in office.

His critics said this program was well under way before he took office.

STRANGE, BITTER POLITICS

Florida Runoff Nears Verdict

AC 6/22/68

By CHARLES F. HESSER

Miami News Politics Writer
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

MIAMI, May 21—One of the strangest and bitterest Democratic runoff campaigns for governor of Florida in the state's history will be decided at the ballot box on Tuesday.

The main antagonists are Gov. Haydon Burns and Miami Mayor Robert King High, who finished in that order in the May 3 primary. But lots of others have gotten, or been brought into the action.

Scott Kelly, for instance, who came in third in the primary, threw his support to High for the runoff and has been out-talking if not out-campaigning candidate High since joining the latter's camp. Burns complains that Kelly has been receiving more publicity than High.

OTHER NAMES injected into the campaign include Gov. and Mrs. George Wallace of Alabama, New York's Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, NAACP leader Roy Wilkins, U.S. Sen. Robert Kennedy, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Florida Secretary of State Tom Adams, Atty. Gen. Earl Faircloth and Elliott Roosevelt, son of the late President.

Burns started off the second primary campaign by charging that Kelly's support had a price tag of $500,000 on it. Burns later reduced the amount to $150,000 and finally dropped the subject when he said he had no proof.

But, this failed to stop Kelly from hitting the campaign trail

Turn to Page 14, Column 1

with High to haunt the governor with the charge. Kelly implored his supporters time and again "to wipe the smear of the big lie off me and my family" by voting for High and thus insuring the defeat of Burns in the governor's bid for re-election.

IN THE PRIMARY, Burns received 372,451 votes to 338,281 for High and 331,580 for Kelly.

Burns injected the racial issue into the runoff.

Referring to Wallace "and his lovely wife, Laurleen," Burns said, "Alabamans went one by one to the polls to reject outside influence and the Negro bloc vote. The people of Florida must do as the people of Alabama—beat down the Negro bloc vote."

Elliott Roosevelt, mayor of Miami Beach, who had stumped for Burns, called a press conference late in the campaign to rebuke the governor for his remarks on race.

In an obvious reference to Alabama, Roosevelt said, "We cannot permit the State of Florida to move backwards into alliances with other Southern states which have consistently and cynically flouted the federal law of our land."

But, Roosevelt did say Burns by his appointment of a number of Negroes to office did more to make civil rights advances in Florida than "any previous governor."

Rep. Powell made a quick trip to Miami, but stayed just long enough to endorse High for governor.

"If I were a Florida citizen, black or white, I would be behind Robert King High," Powell said at a press conference.

AN ENRAGED High cried foul. He said he didn't want Powell's blessing, that everything the New York congressman "stands for is repugnant to me."

High charged that Powell's endorsement had been engineered by a supporter of Burns. The governor replied he didn't know Powell and didn't know anybody who did.

Earlier at a press conference in Miami, Wilkins said "Mayor High is well regarded by the Negro citizens of Florida with whom I've talked."

Burns construed this as an endorsement of High by Wilkins, charging the NAACP leader had joined a "coalition of radical extremists" against him that included Bobby Kennedy. Burns has since been referring to High as "Bobby" High.

THE GOVERNOR inferred that Kennedy was hopeful of securing the control of the 1968 Florida national convention delegation to further his ambitions for vice president.

High has repeatedly denied that Kennedy has any connection with his campaign.

The Miami mayor announced he had requested Dr. King, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, not to come to Florida prior to Tuesday's election "because his presence would be misunderstood."

High said he had information that "politicians were going to try to make something out of Dr. King's presence, to the detriment of good racial relations in this state."

Kelly said he had information that Burns "planned to have a motorcade of Negroes go through Western Florida with Bob High's literature and stickers for no other purpose than to try to influence people of Western Florida on racial matters." Burns heatedly denied any such plan.

SECRETARY OF STATE Tom Adams drew Burns' ire when he charged the governor with state purchasing irregularities and declared Burns was "trying to hide behind the cabinet."

Burns replied with a charge that a corporation Adams was a member of tried to sell a plane to the state. The governor said he blocked the alleged deal because of possible conflict on interest.

An attempt by Burns to link High with a man he called "a big time gambler"—Newell C. Taylor, Miami carnival operator—resulted in a lawsuit being filed against the governor.

Taylor is suing Burns for $100,000. Burns repeated his charge and dared Taylor to sue for a second $100,000.

Taylor went him one better and upped the suit to $250,000 with the remark, "I called him and raised him 50, you might say." Taylor said he would donate any money he collects from the suit to Miami's Variety Children's Hospital, of which he is a director.

Burns had charged that High introduced Taylor to Atty. Gen. Faircloth. Burns said Taylor wanted gambling laws relaxed so that the carnival man could operate games of chance on midways. Faircloth acknowledged High's introduction of Taylor.

"This fellow's wild," High said of Burns. "He realizes he is beaten and is desperate."

High said he was "making it a policy to wait at least 24 hours after the governor makes a charge before I answer. It takes time to get them all compiled."

Burns is a former mayor of Jacksonville. Burns and High have exchanged charges of extravagance and high taxation by each other in the operation of Florida's two largest cities.

Amid the shouting, neither candidate has had much to say about the real issues in the campaign.

The Political Action Committee for Education — a newly organized group of Florida teachers — said at first it was withholding endorsement of either candidate. At a closed-door meeting Friday night, however, PACE gave its endorsement to High.

PACE said neither of the candidates had "shown sufficient concern over the teacher turnover in Florida." PACE endorsed Kelly in the primary.

WITH ONE WEEK still to go in the governor's runoff, Burns reported campaign spending over the $1 million mark. He listed total expenditures of $1,047,289 and contributions of $1,123,932.

Compared to Burns' total, High reported spending $164,243 so far in the campaign and receiving $195,160.

Mrs. Wallace 72,845 Away From Runoff

AC 5/23/72

The Southern Regional Council said Sunday it would have taken Mrs. George Wallace's nine male opponents 72,845 more votes to have forced her into a runoff in the May 3 Democratic primary in Alabama.

Large as this figure was, the council said, it may not be entirely out of reach in future Alabama elections. Negro registration has more than doubled in Alabama since passage of the 1,965 Voting Rights Act.

Present Negro registration is about 49 per cent of the voting age population. White registration is 87 per cent.

The council said that based on returns from selected precincts the Negro vote can be calculated at, or just above, the total vote received by Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers, who ran second to Mrs. Wallace in the primary with 172,386.

Primaries Today Involve Viet and Racial Issues

AC 5/24/72

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Oregon primary Tuesday, presenting what amounts to a referendum on Viet Nam policy, could have far-reaching influence on the pattern of campaigns for November's general election.

And in Florida — one of three other states voting Tuesday -a fresh test has shaped up of what tendency there may be in the South toward racial polarization in political contests.

Also voting Tuesday are Kentucky, which makes nominations for the Senate and House, and Oklahoma, where there are runoffs for both Democratic and Republican nominations for governor and a GOP runoff for the nomination for the Senate.

Senate critics of President Lyndon B. Johnson's Viet Nam policy have described their public attacks as intended to influence him by influencing the voters. That is the explanation offered by Sen. J. W. Fulbright, D-Ark.

The Oregon balloting will test their success, at least among Democratic voters there for the two principal contenders for the Democratic nomination for the Senate are sharply split over Viet Nam.

Rep. Robert B. Duncan, 45, supports the President's policies while Howard Morgan, 52, a former Federal Power Commissioner, is critical of them.

The winner is expected to go up against Gov. Mark O. Hatfield in the Nov. 8 general election. Hatfield has only nominal opposition in the Republican Senate primary.

Though many votes in the Duncan - Morgan contest may be decided by reasons other than Viet Nam, the outcome inevitably will be interpreted by politicians in other states in terms of the Viet Nam war.

In Florida, Gov. Haydon Burns has raised the racial issue in his contest with Miami Mayor Robert King High for the Democratic nomination for governor. He charged there is a "paid Negro bloc vote" for High and called for Florida voters to "stop the bloc vote candidate as they did in Alabama."

In the May 3 Alabama primary, the prospect of a heavy Negro vote for one of her opponents apparently impelled many white voters to support Mrs. Lurleen Wallace who won the Democratic nomination for governor overwhelmingly.

Oklahoma Democrats choose between former Gov. Raymond Gary and Preston Moore, an Oklahoma City attorney and former American Legion national commander, for their party's nominee for governor.

Republicans will settle runoff races for the senate and for governor. Pat Patterson and Don Kinkaid, both of Oklahoma City, are bidding for the Senate nomination.

Kentucky has contests for the nominations for the Senate, but the opposition is only token for Republican Sen. John Sherman Cooper.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rep. Howard (Bo) Callaway, considered by some to be the first Republican to become the leading candidate for governor of Georgia, shoved his campaign into high gear as U.S. Sen. Herman Talmadge ruled himself out of the race Monday.

The Republicans, with Talmadge not heading the Democratic ticket, have hopes of winning a majority of the Georgia congressional seats this year.

Related stories on Pages 3, 13 and 20.

Callaway has opened a campaign headquarters in Atlanta, it was learned Monday. That makes at least two campaign offices for Callaway in Georgia. The other is at Columbus.

The 39-year-old congressman is lining up his timetable so he can spend as much time as possible campaigning in Georgia without missing major roll call votes in the House of Representatives.

Callaway does not plan to announce formally for governor until around July 1.

However, campaign machinery has been in motion for several months. The machinery skipped a beat last week when Talmadge announced he was available as a gubernatorial candidate.

The Callaway organization began stepping up the tempo when reports that Talmadge had decided against the gorvernor's race mounted last week.

Talmadge called a 10 a.m. press conference Monday to announce that he had decided he could best serve the long-range interest of Georgia by remaining in the Senate where he is nearing 10 years of seniority.

The senator said he had received several thousand communications from Georgians since last Wednesday and his statement was as follows:

"They almost unanimously pledged their support for any course of action that I determined upon.

"The majority thought that I could best serve the state's interests in the immediate future by serving as governor of Georgia.

"The majority also felt that I could best serve the state's interests in the long range by continuing to serve in the United States Senate.

"They pointed out that I have obtained almost 10 years of seniority and have important committee assignments. They further pointed out that most of the political battles of our times now occur in Washington and not in Atlanta, Ga.

"In accordance with what I think to be the overwhelming majority views of the people of Georgia and in the long-range interest of our state, I shall continue to serve in the United States Senate to the best of my ability."

The senator's decision opened up the question of whether the Talmadge political structure had settled on a candidate to support in the Democratic primary.

PARTY PLEDGE

There was no evidence of a ground swell for any such candidate.

"The matter of selection of the Democratic candidate will be for the people of Georgia," said Talmadge. "I expect to vote for the Democratic candidates from the United States Senate down to the state legislature."

Talmadge refused to be pinned down on whether he would campaign for the Democratic nominee for governor.

"That is a bridge to cross when we get to it," he said.

Talmadge said he thinks Callaway will be a "formidable candidate if he runs."

In reply to reports that Callaway had said Talmadge was afraid to run for governor, the senator said, "I think Congressman Callaway knows me well enough to know I don't frighten easily."

CALLAWAY RESPONSE

Callaway, on a speaking tour in northwest Georgia, issued a statement that said in part:

"It would seem apparent that the people have again demonstrated their overwhelming confidence and trust in the senator's ability and performance in congress . . . I join the people of Georgia in expressing my confidence in the junior senator and in his ability to make the right decision for the best interest of Georgia."

The Republican congressman's supporters were jubilant at Talmadge's decision. They did not waste time in merrymaking, however.

The Republicans had anticipated Talmadge's announcement since Sunday, and they had already begun to buckle down to work toward victory this fall.

Victory in the governor's race is not the single element in the Republican campaign portfolio.

Before the Talmadge thunderclap struck last week, the Republicans were hopeful of winning three of the state's 10 congressional seats.

Monday afternoon, they were predicting the GOP might win as many as six seats in Congress, which is a majority in the Georgia delegation.

Politics and People POLITICS

And a Machine Starts to Crumble

By SAM HOPKINS
Constitution Political Editor

The curtain is slowly rising on a new political drama in Georgia.

Its title:

"The Beginning of the Destruction of a Political Machine."

Sam Hopkins

Many will have had a hand in the production, but Sen. Herman Talmadge must be considered the chief author, as well as the principal character.

There are some who will view the event as a classic example of Greek tragedy.

Others will see it as a comedy of monumental proportions.

But let us examine the reality behind the play itself:

Sen. Talmadge, in what many politicians believe was a fatal mistake, jumped into the governor's race, got wishy-washy and then decided to get out.

LITTLE DOUBT

There seemed to be little doubt in most minds that he could have defeated Republican Rep. Howard (Bo) Callaway if he stayed in the race.

Many now are so disappointed at Talmadge that they have their doubts he could beat Callaway if he changed his mind again.

And there are grave doubts that any Talmadge-backed man can run well against Callaway—and this includes any member of the Statehouse "Clique."

IN BAD SHAPE

Talmadge in the future will be in bad political shape regardless of whether Callaway or former Gov. Ellis Arnall wins the governorship.

If Arnall wins the Democratic nomination, that will mean a hard slap in the face — and a swift boot in the posterior—to the entire "Talmadge machine" which has dominated Georgia politics for so many years.

And if Callaway should happen to beat Arnall — or whomever the Democratic nominee may be — it could well be argued that Talmadge was responsible for turning over the State Capitol to the Republicans.

NOTHING TO GAIN

So Tamadge has everything to lose and nothing to gain because of the political fiasco which he began last Wednesday after Ernest Vandiver got out of the governor's race.

The prospect of coming up with a substitute for Talmadge —whom he could actively support — appears to be growing dimmer each day.

"They're trying to come up with a Talmadge boy," one veteran politician observed Monday, "but they're all either dyi off or have lost too much luster to make a strong race."

So the curtain begins to rise on the opening scene of "The Beginning of the Destruction of a Political Machine."

And the first act will not be over until Sept. 14 when the Democratic primary is over—with perhaps an extra flourish for the fun off.

The second act will conclude on Nov 8 with the general election.

And then two years from now the third act will be played out when Sen. Talmadge runs for reelection.

Even if Talmadge is reelected, his old political machine by then may be in such poor condition that it could not stay together much longer thereafter.

And as the plot unfolds, it just depends on who you are as to whether you want to laugh or cry over the whole thing.

Callaway Seems In as Governor, Roy Harris Says

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP) — Roy V. Harris, veteran politician who helped Herman Talmadge become governor of Georgia, said Monday Talmadge's decision to remain in the Senate virtually assures the election of Republican Rep. Howard H. Callaway as governor.

"Our leaders in Georgia have wrecked the Democratic party," Harris said. "You cannot support Lyndon Johnson and his policies and at the same time protect the interests of the people of Georgia."

Harris, 70, was the No. 1 lieutenant to Herman Talmadge in 1947 after Talmadge was inaugurated as governor, succeeding his father, the late Eugene Talmadge.

Washington: Johnson and the Larger Crisis

By JAMES RESTON

WASHINGTON, June 30—The Johnson Administration may finally get over its agony in Vietnam — it may even achieve its military objective in the end — but it will probably never regain the confidence it has lost in its judgment and veracity.

With the bombing of targets on the outskirts of Hanoi and Haipong, it has now done almost everything it said or indicated it would not do except bomb China, and the end of this melancholy chapter in American history is not yet.

The Johnson Administration said it was not seeking a military solution to the war, and it is now obviously seeking precisely that. It said it was there merely to help a legitimate government defend itself, and it has ended up by replacing a military clique that is not a government not legitimate and is not really defending itself.

Johnson's Guile

Even when allowances are made for the uncertainties and moral ambiguities of warfare, the guile of this Administration, exercised in the name of high and even noble principle, is hard to match. It was not going beyond the Seventeenth Parallel in Vietnam, but went beyond. It was merely going to respond to enemy attacks on its bases, but it went over to the offensive. It was not going to get involved in a major war on the Asian land mass, but it did.

The President was not even faithful to his bad resolves: He said he would not negotiate, but then offered to do so, and spoiled that by refusing to negotiate with the major elements of the enemy he faces. He has not merely misled his enemies but his friends. His old colleagues in the Congress have not forgiven him yet for tricking them into support of a blank check defense of all of Southeast Asia under circumstances they could not possibly oppose. And even in this last adventure in Hanoi and Haiphong, we are told officially that these bombings are not an "escalation" of the war.

Uncertainty Unlimited

The result here is an atmosphere of uncertainty and suspicion. The hawks are as confused as the doves about what is coming next. There is now not a single major nation in the world that supports Mr. Johnson's latest adventure in Hanoi and Haiphong. Even Prime Minister Wilson of Britain, whose economic policy depends on President Johnson's continued support of the pound sterling, felt obliged to make a public statement against the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong, and when he was in trouble about keeping a British military force east of Suez in support of the United States, he produced an interesting defense. He said, in effect, that he thought Britain should stay there rather than leave the Americans alone to use their judgment in a confrontation with China.

This question of confidence in the good judgment and good faith of the United States Government is really more important than anything else. The specific arguments about bombing or not bombing the oil refineries are not vital. Honest men can obviously differ about the wisdom of the decision. Nevertheless, the fate of Vietnam or the United States does not hang on any of these specific arguments. But a great deal does hang on whether the American people can trust the pronouncements of their Government, whether they can remain united on purposes they understand and respect, whether the allies believe Washington really wants a compromise settlement in Vietnam, or merely a surrender on its terms.

Nobody knows in these circumstances what is now ahead —not the people crying "rejoice, rejoice!" about the bombing in Hanoi; or the Allies or Senator Russell of Georgia who opposed the original Vietnam adventure and now supports every new escalation of power; or the friends of Johnson and the press who proclaim their support in whatever he does. For so much has been said and then rejected, that nobody can be sure or feel reasonably confident, and this is the problem.

We must bring more pressure on the enemy "at the source," President Johnson said the other day, warning everybody of the coming bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong. This bombing, Secretary of Defense McNamara observed after the attack, "will force North Vietnam to seek alternatives," which is true and raises an interesting question.

Sources in China

What if the enemy now brings in new supplies overland from China's ports to replace the bombed Haiphong stores of oil and places them just over the China border from North Vietnam? Will we then carry the bombing to "the source" in China? Nobody knows, because so many things have been said here and then repudiated that everybody is in doubt.

This is the larger question about the war and President Johnson. There seems to be no guiding principle to what he is doing; there is certainly little faith here in the official spoken word; there is immense power but little confidence in anything except that this power will probably be used by Lyndon Johnson until Jan. 20, 1973.

Negroes and Conservatives in the New South

By TOM WICKER

WASHINGTON, Aug. 6—When Virgina Democrats turned the veterans Senator Willis Robertson and Representative Howard W. Smith out of office a week or so ago, some quick assumptions were made that a "new day" was dawning in Southern politics.

So it certainly is, but the more recent Democratic primaries in Arkansas and Tennessee have made clearer the nature of the new day. They suggest that it will be one in which the new Southern Negro vote will have a marked effect on candidates and government—but not by controlling or dominating elections. And it probably will be a day about which conservatism and a newly vigorous Republican party will have a good deal to say.

Several Factors Involved

Thousands of newly registered Negroes contributed to the defeat of Senator Robertson and Representative Smith, both old-line segregationists and conservatives; but Senator Robertson's advanced age, emphasized by the terminal illness of his former colleague, Harry F. Byrd, and the fact that Representative Smith's district had been redrawn to include urban areas were perhaps more important.

In Arkansas, however, Jim Johnson, a segregationist and conservative, led a badly split field of Democrats for that state's gubernatorial nomination and may win it outright in a runoff primary Tuesday.

In Tennessee, two of the state's most familiar politicians were nominated by Democrats for the governorship and for a seat in the Senate. Former Gov. Buford Ellington defeated a youthful liberal, John Jay Hooker, for the gubernatorial nomination; Gov. Frank Clement, the one-time boy wonder who is no longer so boyish, upset Senator Ross Bass, another liberal.

The Tennessee Pattern

The pattern of Negro participation in the Tennessee primary was significant. First, it was noticeable that none of the four major Democratic candidates made the slightest appeal to segregationist sentiment; on the contrary, each openly sought the support of Negroes, who now constitute about 15 per cent of the state's total vote.

This was a major switch for Mr. Ellington, who in a previous campaign proclaimed himself a segregationist, and a somewhat lesser one for Mr. Clement, who ran a much more conservative campaign when he lost to Mr. Bass in 1964.

Second, despite the respect in which all the candidates obviously held the Negro vote, heavy Negro support for Mr. Hooker and Mr. Bass still could not affect them, just as Negro voting in Arkansas did not defeat Mr. Johnson.

In some precincts, Mr. Hooker scored as heavily as nine to one among Negroes, and in others he often ran as strongly as five to one. Mr. Bass, who voted for the civil rights acts of both 1964 and 1965, also got a high proportion of Negro votes, yet lost. There simply are not enough Negro votes available in Southern states to give Negroes dominance in southern elections.

More responsible for the Tennessee results than Negro voting was the behavior of Republicans and those conservative Democrats who often vote Republican in Southern general elections.

In 1964, 45,335 voters went for Barry Goldwater in Davidson County (surrounding Nashville). This week, the same county cast only 3,394 votes in a Republican senatorial primary won by Howard Baker, a son-in-law of Everett McKinley Dirksen.

The G.O.P. Vote

Statewide, only about 136,000 Republicans appear to have voted for Mr. Baker or his opponent; on the basis of past elections, a minimum of 250,000 might have been expected. Obviously, thousands of Republicans—or Democrats who voted Republican in the 1964 elections—voted in the Democratic primary, probably for the more conservative candidates, Mr. Ellington and Mr. Clement. Tennessee observers considered this a major factor in the Ellington triumph; he carried Davidson County, for instance, by about 20,000 votes, a margin probably supplied by former Goldwater voters.

Thus, Tennessee Democrats in nominating two unexciting party regulars over more promising and more vigorous younger men scarcely moved as far toward a "new day" as did those in Virginia. But the results of extensive Negro participation still were encouraging, because the presence of Negro voters in large numbers may have permanently altered the tone of Tennessee politics. This 15 per cent of the electorate is not likely to be ignored or slighted again, either in elections or by state government. In the long run, that may be more important than the fate of specific candidates.

The Conservative Future

The primary also proved that the South's economic orthodoxy and its suspicion of "big government" provide a substantial conservative voting force that does not have to be aroused with racial appeals, of which there were none in Tennessee. And it further suggests that the Southern Republican party, by putting forward attractive candidates of their own and organizing effectively, eventually may be able to lure thousands of conservative Democrats from their traditional party registration without trying to become the new party of segregation.

Thus, almost as clearly as Virginia signalled the possibility of a moderately liberal Democratic party in the South, Tennessee showed the potential of a moderately conservative Republican party. At least in the upper South, the old order with its racial demagoguery is surely dying and the two-party system is slowly rising in its place.

Arnall Favored to Beat Maddox in Georgia Runoff

United Press International

FACES RUNOFF: Former Gov. Ellis G. Arnall of Georgia led Democratic primary for the office but did not have enough votes to avoid a runoff contest.

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Sept. 15—Former Gov. Ellis Gibbs Arnall, a Liberal, will meet Lester G. Maddox, a staunch segregationist, in a runoff primary for the Democratic nomination for Governor Sept. 28.

In a field of six candidates of mixed persuasions, Mr. Arnall led Mr. Maddox 209,845 to 163,838 with 1,710 of the state's 1,910 precincts reported.

Liberals were encouraged by Mr. Arnall's showing.

However, they were unsettled by an unusually light voter turnout. The backlash might simply have been silent and deferred.

Thousands of persons who used to vote in Democratic primaries did not go to the polls yesterday, particularly in the Goldwater strongholds of 1964. It is evident that many of these are waiting to vote for the Republican nominee, United States Representative Howard H. Callaway, in November and that the Democratic nominee will face an up-hill fight.

Some backlash was apparent yesterday. Mr. Arnall had been expected to get 40 to 45 per cent of the vote. One poll gave him 43 per cent, with a large undecided vote projected and included in the total. The former Governor had the backing of many courthouse politicians who fear a Republican take-over in November.

He also had the support of Negroes—which Mr. Callaway will use against him in November—liberals and many of the corporate and financial interests of Atlanta.

With all that, and after 14 months of campaigning, Mr. Arnall received only 29.3 per cent of the vote.

Hurt by Newcomer

He owes his first-place showing to the Negro vote. Almost half of his votes were those of Negroes, judging from the results in Atlanta, where he captured 88 per cent of the Negro vote, and presuming that he fared that well among Negroes statewide. That means that he got only about 15 per cent of the white votes cast yesterday.

He was hurt further by the surprisingly strong race run by a newcomer to a statewide politics, State Senator Jimmy Carter. Senator Carter, of the hamlet of Plains in south Georgia, was almost unknown before the campaign.

Capitalizing on a boyish smile which makes him look like President Kennedy, and noncontroversial public statements, he came in third, well ahead of James H. Gray, a major segregationist candidate, and just behind Mr. Maddox. Incomplete returns gave him 153,173.

Mr. Gray finished fourth with 137,487. He leaned heavily on reaction against Negro violence. A stronger backlash might have aided him.

It might also have helped the fifth-place contender, former Lieut. Gov. Garland T. Byrd, whose main issue was resistance to the guidelines established by the Federal Department of Health, Education and Welfare to speed school desegregation. Mr. Byrd got only 34,994 votes.

Hoke O'Kelley, a perennially unsuccessful candidate, got 12,324.

In other races, W. S. Stuckey Jr. of Eastman, in southeast Georgia, heir to a chain of roadside candy stores, defeated United States Representative J. Russell Tuten in his bid for nomination to a third term.

Representative Phil M. Landrum, dean of Georgia's House delegation, narrowly defeated Zell Miller, a young challenger who accused Mr. Landrum of being too close to President Johnsonist candidates.

Representative G. Elliott Hagan faces a run-off with State Senator Frank Downing of Savannah.

Maddox Victory Gives Georgia A Choice of 2 Goldwater Men

POLITICS 91

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Sept. 29 — Lester G. Maddox's smashing primary victory yesterday put the voters of Georgia in the position of choosing between two Goldwater men for Governor in November.

Mr. Maddox, a segregationist Democrat, will oppose United States Representative Howard H. Callaway, a segregationist Republican, in the general election Nov. 8.

Mr. Maddox defeated former Governor Ellis G. Arnall for the Democratic nominiation by more than 70,000 votes. Unofficial returns from 1,805 of the state's 1,881 precincts gave Mr. Maddox 430,421 votes and Mr. Arnall 360,020.

Mr. Callaway will begin his campaign officially tomorrow at Atlanta.

On Same Side in '64

Both candidates supported Senator Barry M. Goldwater for President in 1964. The Senator carried Georgia, and this was interpreted as a sign of reviving conservatism in the state.

However, the Atlanta area has one of the largest collections of liberals in the South, and the liberals had looked forward to a clear-cut liberal-conservative battle between Mr. Arnall and Mr. Callaway this fall.

They were shocked and dismayed by yesterday's primary.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and a resident of Atlanta, issued a statement saying the election made him "ashamed to be a Georgian."

"Georgia is a sick state produced by the diseases of a sick nation," he said.

Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. of Atlanta, a moderate Democrat, called Mr. Maddox "a totally unqualified individual" and added, "The seal of the great state of Georgia has been tarnished."

Republicans were accused of invading the Democratic primary and voting for Mr. Maddox to give Mr. Callaway an easier target. The Republicans denied that, but a persual of the returns from Goldwater strongholds indicated that some Callaway voters probably did vote for Mr. Maddox.

There was bitter talk among some Atlanta liberals today of a write-in campaign in November. Otherwise, they said, liberals and Negroes will have no candidate.

Callaway Vote Weighed

There was also guarded talk that liberals and Negroes might have to swallow their pride and vote for Mr. Callaway, on the theory that he might be less irresponsible in the face of racial turmoil.

Mr. Callaway's strength rests partly on his image as a "nice guy." His conservative views do not appear to be widely known. He is conservative on both economic matters and race.

Mr. Maddox, on the other hand, strikes a fairly liberal posture on economic problems. His victory statement last night summed up one of his major campaign themes. He said:

"I call on all Georgians to help me provide new jobs and better jobs, better health institutions, better care for the elderly and needy, better roads, and to improve everything that our state government touches."

Business and political leaders who might have been expected to back Mr. Arnall, a millionaire lawyer, seemed to take little part in the runoff campaign that ended in yesterday's voting.

NIXON URGES G.O.P. TO UNITE IN SOUTH

Insists Party Can Win if It Sticks to Fundamentals

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI, Fla., Sept. 29—Co-eds in bikinis were cavorting in the championship pool, students between classes were lounging under bright umbrellas on the plaza, and in a television studio at the Student Union, Richard M. Nixon was denouncing the Democrats and pleading for unity among Republicans.

For the uniformly bronzed and healthy undergraduates, it was just another day in Miami's perpetual summer.

For Mr. Nixon, it was the end of a three-day tour of four Southern states that had begun in the ornate lobby of an old hotel in Jackson, Tenn., and was now approaching its climax on the modern campus of the University of Miami.

In a symbolic sense, no better bookends could have been chosen for the Nixon swing, which he undertook on behalf of Republican candidates for the House in districts where races are close.

Throughout the trip he has insisted, with steadily rising fervor, that the Republican party could and should win in the South—not only in newer, vibrant cities like Miami, where the living is easy and the politics tend to be liberal, but in the older centers of Tennessee, South Carolina and North Carolina, where wages are sometimes low and the politics more conservative.

Mr. Nixon's view, which he has expressed in numerous speeches during the past few days, is that such unity is essential if the G.O.P. is ever going to return to prominence in American politics.

He also believes just as strongly that such unity is attainable if the Southern wing of the party agrees to bury the race issue—to attack and win, not on what he described to a reporter as a "dead horse," but by sticking to Republican fundamentals such as discipline in government, the primacy of local and state control, the rising danger of inflation and resolution in Vietnam.

He denounced "unconscionable boondoggles" in the poverty program in Memphis, and the crowd roared. He told a North Carolina audience that the President must "cut the Federal budget so that millions of Americans can balance their family budgets", and the allusion to rising prices drew the best applause of the afternoon.

And here in Miami, he brought a placid student audience to life with the assertion that "America has become a great nation not because of what Government has done for people but because of what people have done for themselves."

Mr. Nixon, in his news conference along the way, handled questions touching on the racial issue with a delicate blend of candor and political expertise.

In general, he began by reminding his listeners that he supported the Supreme Court decision in 1954 and the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965, which made his own position clear. He then said that he could not condone riots, violence in the streets and "mob rule" by any group, which pleased the racial conservatives in the audience.

He finished by accusing the Johnson Administration of "complete failure" to provide jobs for Negroes at a time when white unemployment had declined. This was aimed at those who would read of his remarks in the North.

Neither Mr. Nixon nor his aides appeared particularly alarmed by the victory in the Georgia Democratic primary of segregationist Lester G. Maddo Mr. Nixon said he thought the victory would have no impact on the election strategy of the Republican czndidate, U. S. Representative Howard H. Callaway, who has been moderate on the race issue and has stuck largely to Republican fundamentals.

"He (Callaway) will run the same kind of campaign against Mr. Maddox that he would have if Mr. Maddox had lost," Mr. Nixon said at a news conference today.

Poll Shows Rise in Concern on Civil Rights—Violence Deplored by Eisenhower

10/4/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — Republican leaders said today they had found the race issue to be of increasing concern to Americans. The Republicans moved to give the issue more prominence in the current political races.

In a related development, the House Committee on Un-American Activities announced that it would conduct an investigation into the role of "subversive elements" in the riots that occurred in many American cities in recent months.

The race issue in various forms has been a factor in many political races this year but in most instances it has simmered beneath the surface. Many candidates have avoided mentioning it in their campaign speeches, for a variety of reasons.

Today, the Republican Coordinating Committee received the results of a poll conducted for the Republican National Committee on the sentiment and opinions of voters on various issues.

58% Cite Rights Issues

Ray C. Bliss, the committee chairman and the national G.O.P. chairman, told a news conference that 58 per cent of the persons questioned considered civil rights to be one of the most important domestic problems. He said this was an increase from 44 per cent in a similar poll taken [illegible]

This, Mr. Bliss said, indicated concern over riots and racial disorders as well as the advance, or lack of it, of the civil rights of Negroes and other minorities.

The study was conducted for the G.O.P. by an independent organization, Opinion Research Corporation of Princeton.

In the statements that followed Mr. Bliss's comments today, it was apparent that some of the Republican leaders believed that riots and other disorders were the main cause of the increased concern on the racial issue.

Eisenhower Finds Anger

Former President Dwight D. Eisenhower volunteered a statement on law and order, saying that the public was "very rightly definitely angry" about both increased crime and violence.

"I think the Republicans ought to take the strongest possible position and pledge to remove this curse," he said.

The coordinating committee issued a prepared statement saying in part:

"Unfortunately, the Johnson-Humphrey Administration has accomplished nothing of substance to date to promote public safety. Indeed, high officials of this Administration have condoned and encoureaged disregard for law and order."

Representative Gerald R. Ford of Michiga, the mnority leader in the House, was asked what "high officials" th statement referred to. He said that Vice President Humphrey, for example, said last summer in New Orleans that he might riot, too, if he had to live under some of the conditions in American slums.

Mr. Humphrey has since advocated law and order in his speeches condemning the results of poverty.

The committee statement also said:

"In this moral crisis, Americans are looking for leadership, inspiration and example. Example is more than exhortatio Inspiration is more than another law enforcement conference. Leadership must stand above the slightest suspicion."

General Eisenhower said he would favor Federal grants to local police departments in an effort to reduce crime and violence.

"If we are going to give grants and aid to states and cities," he said, "I would rather see us do something along this line than some of the programs they are so concerned with."

Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the Senate minority leader, said the country was in danger of losing the gains made in civil rights because the Administration was "not restraining some of these people."

Key Campaign Issue

Mr. Bliss said that concern about civil rights and related matters had increased at a greater rate this summer than concern about rising prices.

Although the committee placed no priorities on issues, the members seemed to be trying to push "law and order" to the forefront of the campaign.

The Congressional investigation into possible subversive elements in riots was announced by Representative Edwin E. Willis, Democrat of Louisiana who is chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities.

He said the inquiry would deal with "only one thing—planned and organized violence by subversive elements." He added that "we have no intention of investigating the civil rights movement or the opinions of postions of any individual or organization on the civil rights issue."

Mr. Willis added, however:

"If we should learn in the course of our investigation, that a certain organization which claims to be a civil rights group is actually controlled or dominated by Communists carrying out the work of the Communist party, we should not hesitate to investigate their operations."

Mr. Willis said that no public hearings had been scheduled and that the investigation would begin with a staff inquiry, the results of which will be presented to the committee, which would then determine whether to pursue the matter further.

Admirers of Callaway Shift to Maddox—Republicans Also Lag in Alabama

10/9/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 8—White backlash is threatening the prospects of some of the South's most promising Republican candidates this fall, only two years after it helped the party carry the Deep South for Barry Goldwater.

This could thwart Republican hopes of electing a Southern Governor for the first time in more than 40 years and contribute to holding the party to token, if any, gains in Congress.

The party is better organized and is fielding a larger number of candidates in the South this year than in the past, however, and the general drift continues to be toward a two-party South.

The impact of the backlash is especially strong in Georgia, where Representative Howard H. (Bo) Callaway was favored to become the state's first Republican Governor in 98 years.

His sharp opposition in Congress to the Johnson Administration and to civil rights legislation had won him the admiration of many white Georgians who were concerned that Government was "growing too big" and that the Negro was "pushing too hard."

But Lester G. Maddox, who once sold ax handles to dramatize his resistance to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, won the Democratic governorship nomination last week in a stunning upset.

Switch in Odds

Suddenly, many segregationists decided that for all their admiration for Mr. Callaway, Mr. Maddox would put up an even stiffer fight against desegregation and the Great Society. Now Mr. Callaway is the underdog.

"I'm reminded of Little Bo Peep," Mr. Maddox chortled this week over Mr. Callaway's reversal of political fortune. "Well, Little Bo Callaway has lost lots of his sheep, and he knows where they've gone. I do, too, and he can't get them back."

Mr. Callaway is not alone in his problems.

In Alabama last spring, it was difficult to find a politician who did not think the governorship would go to Representative James D. Martin, a Republican, who also was noted for his opposition to President Johnson and the civil rights movement.

But Gov. George C. Wallace, an archsegregationist and Democrat who was barred by the state constitution from succeeding himself, ran his wife as a stand-in candidate and led her to an overwhelming victory. Now the political consensus is that the Republicans will lose the Governor's race and at least two of their five seats in the House of Representatives.

Should Governor Wallace call for a "straight Democratic vote," still more Republican Congressmen might be defeated. If he told voters to vote as they saw fit, it would be interpreted as a move to oppose Senator John J. Sparkman, who appears to be ahead in his race against John Grenier, a top aide to Mr. Goldwater in the Presidential race of 1964.

Image Improved

Although Winthrop Rockefeller, the Republican governorship candidate in Arkansas is not a segregationist, his campaign for Mr. Goldwater in 1964 had improved his ifage among civil rights foes and opponents-of-the-Great-Society. He generally was given a 50-50 chance of winning.

In August, however, James D. Johnson, a founder of the White Citizens Council in Arkansas, won the Democratic nomination as an outspoken critic of President Johnson. Since then, Mr. Rockefeller has also joined the ranks of the underdogs.

The governorship campaigns of Arkansas, Alabama and Georgia are providing the most dramatic examples of white anger over Negro riots, the black power movement, the Federal Government guidelines for school desegregation and general progress by the Negro. But throughout the South, Democrats are concerned over white unrest and are taking steps to minimize the impact of backlash on their campaigns or to turn it against the Republicans.

In North Carolina, generally one of the more moderate states in its outlook on race relations and the national Democratic party, most Democratic candidates for Congress rose up in protest when a report spread that President Johnson might come into the state for a campaign talk.

And three Democratic representatives — Harold D. Cooley, L. H. Fountain and Walter Jones — have been calling for the immediate resignation of the United States Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe, 2d the man they regard as most responsible for the desegregation guidelines.

Attack on Eartland

This, according to the political consensus in North Carolina, appears almost certain to insure the re-election of Mr. Fountain and Mr. Jones and while Representative Cooley, the chairman of the House Agricultural Committee, is expected to have a tougher race, he is still ranked as the favorite.

In Mississippi, Representative Prentiss Walker is trying to attack Senator James O. Eastland from the right in the Mississippi senatorial campaign. He is charging that Mr. Eastland is friendly to Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York, and that there would have been less racial de- Mr. Eastland's Judiciary Com- segregation in the South if mittee had blocked the appointment of several judges now on the bench.

Senator Eastland, always a foe of civil rights movements, is stumping up his criticism and is still the favorite in what could be a close race.

In the two senatorial races in Virginia, the Democrats and Republicans are each running a moderate and conservative candidate, and the angriest segment of the backlash vote is expected to go to the Conservative party, which polled 14 per cent of the vote in last year's governorhip election and is intensifying its campaign this year.

While the Conservative party is not generally conceded a chance to win a major office, a substantial increase in its strength could siphon support away from Senator Harry F. Byrd Jr., the more conservative of the two Democrats, and cause his defeat by Lawrence Traylor, the Republican candidate. Mr. Traylor, a liberal Republican, is expected to receive the Negro vote.

William Spong, the moderate candidate, is a heavy favorite in the other Senate race. He is expected to receive the Negro vote, and a heavy backlash vote for the Conservative party is more likely to hurt his Republican opponent, James T. Auld Jr., the former Mayor of Lynchburg, who, although more conservative than Mr. Song, would rank as a middle of the roader in the Deep Southern states.

Intensive Drive

In Louisiana, Democrats are not facing a major effort by Republicans, but intensive campaigning is under way by the Republicans in South Carolina. There, Democrats, while not abandoning a relatively moderate posture on race, are guarding against backlash by attacking school desegregation guidelines and taking care not to be identified with the Johnson Administration.

Former Gov. Ernest F. Hollins, the Democratic senatorial nominee, recently declared that he would not vote for President Johnson in 1968. He is being opposed by State Senator Marshall Parker, a Democrat-turned-Republican.

While the Republicans are considered virtually certain to re-elect Senator Strom Thurmond and Representative Albert W. Watson and are causing Democrats concern in other races, for Governor and Congress, they are still in an uphill battle.

Even the widespread debate over the school guidelines is yet to spill into the Florida governorship race, which is being waged without reference to race. But if a backlash develops, it is likely to benefit Claude Kirk, a Republican, who is attacking the Johnson Administration.

Thus far, Mayor Robert King High of Miami, the Democratic nominee and a liberal who is taking care not to be tied to either President Johnson or Senator Robert Kennedy, is still the front-runner, according to recent polls.

In Tennessee, backlash could result in the gain of one, possibly two, House seats in the western part of the state. But in the Senate race, Gov. Frank G. Clement, the Democratic nominee for Governor, and his Republican opponent, Howard H. Baker Jr., who is the son-in-law of the Senate minority leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen, are both wooing the Negro vote.

And after seven hours of bitter debate, the Tennessee Voters Council, the most influential Negro voters organization, gave its endorsement to Governor Clement.

In Georgia and Alabama, Negroes say their decision is far tougher, for entirely different reasons. Many Negroes, as well as white liberals, consider both the Republican and Democratic candidates in these states to be hostile.

In Georgia, some Negroes are considering a write-in campaign, and in Alabama, some say they may vote for an independent candidate unless one of the major candidates offers them concessions. The final decision is yet to be made.

Negro Unit Supporting Callaway

AC 10/14/66

An agency of Georgia's 500,000-member Negro Baptist Convention endorsed Republican Howard H. (Bo) Callaway for governor Thursday and at the same time urged its members not to participate in a write-in campaign for former Gov. Ellis Arnall.

William Bowdoin

Also announcing support for Callaway Thursday was Atlanta banker William R. Bowdoin. Bowdoin is chairman of the Governor's Commission for Efficiency and Improvetent in Government.

"I intend to support Mr. Callaway and give him whatever assistance I possibly can toward the achievement of the goal he seeks," Bowdoin said.

Earlier Thursday Callaway announced the names of 63 prominent Georgia Democrats of the past who will be active in the "Democrats for Callaway" organization set up Tuesday.

GROUP'S ACTION

The Rev. L. M. Terrill of Atlanta, president and chairman of the Socio-Political Action Commission of the General Baptist Convention, said the Negro church group took 8ts action Wednesday.

The commission's resolution, which was adopted unanimously, said "a vote for law and order is the main issue at the polls on Nov. 8 and supersedes party labels."

It called on Negro Baptists to "join hands for Democrats for Callaway and keep the state one of law and order.

"We do not want our state controlled by the Ku Klux Klan on one hand or molested or upset by Stokely Carmichael, street violence and 'black power' on the other."

Carmichael, a "black power" spokesman, is chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"No write-in candidate has a chance to win," the resolution said. "A vote for any write-in candidate is a wasted vote. A stay-at-home vote is a vote for ax handles."

Maddox, who closed a profitable restaurant business rather than serve Negroes, sold ax handles there as souvenirs and called them "Pickrick drumsticks."

Terrill said the resolution was intended to be defininte and that the commission is empowered to speak for its membership.

"We thought it was time somebody said something," he said.

SCLC STAYS OUT

Meanwhile, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said it is not involved in partisan politics.

Junis Griffin, SCLC information director, said the group upholds the right of any citizen to participate in public affairs as a private citizen.

But, he added, the SCLC "must stay out of party politics. We always have and we always will."

Griffin's statement came after the Alliance for Social, Economic and Political Progress earlier this week said more than 50 civil rights groups, including the SCLC, would endorsse a write-in for Arnall.

In the Tight Races, The Backlash Vote May Mean Victory

POLITICS

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE, Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16—The white backlash is once again a major factor in an American political campaign.

It has already proved to be the decisive issue in primary contests in Georgia and Maryland. It may well make the difference in close contests in nine states north of the Mason-Dixon Line, possibly more.

These include governorship races in California and Massachusetts, the Senate race in Illinois and Congressional battles in California, Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Ohio, New York and perhaps New Jersey and Connecticut.

It is still the top factor in Maryland, where the Democratic candidate for Governor, George P. Mahoney, will rise or fall on his opposition to open housing. It is clearly a critical factor in most areas of the old Confederacy.

In many states, however, politicians, while apprehensive, are uncertain whether the alarm should be sounded. There appear to be large areas of the nation where, for various reasons, the backlash is likely to be of small political consequence.

These findings reflect the judgments of political observers and candidates all over the country who were asked last week to measure the dimensions of the white backlash in their areas and to gauge whether it would be an important factor in the November elections.

They all agreed on one point: Latent or visible, there seems to be growing white resentment to aspects of the civil rights movement, whether it be violence in the streets, the cry by militants of black power or the question of open housing.

There was also widespread agreement that the beneficiaries of any white backlash would frequently be Republican candidates, partly because the major civil rights acts have been written under Democratic Administrations partly because voter resentment tends to penalize the "ins" and reward the "outs," whether or not the "outs" deliberately try to exploit the issue, and partly because some Republican candidates are courting the segregationist vote.

In some areas, however, such as Georgia, the Democratic candidate is even more anti-Negro than his segregationist Republican opponent.

Acordingly, Democrats in Washington are scared, both on the Congressional level and in Administration circles.

In Congress, normally liberal Democrats have joined conservative Republicans and Southern Democrats in an attack on the forcing of racial balance through the busing of pupils. They have also contributed to attempts to slow down Federal efforts to desegregate schools, and, at least in the Senate, they remained absent or silent during the debate over the civil rights bill of 1966.

'Number One Issue'

A high White House source declared:

"I actually feel that the number one issue is the backlash, even though it's hard to talk about."

Alexander E. Barkan, director of the Political Education Committee of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, said:

"Our problem now is race. This is the thing that bothers us."

There is apprehension and caution everywhere. An upstate New York freshman Democrat in the House, Joseph Y. Resnick, said he did not think the backlash would materialize in his district and that the racial issue ranked well below "economic and foreign policy issues as a in the 1964 Democratic Presidential primary.

Lynn E. Stalbaum, a liberal Democrat, who triumphed in the normally Republican First District in 1964, said:

"There are undercurrents there that may be working against me. There have been disturbances in Wauwatosa and Waukegan, and although neither is in my district, they are close to it, and I think they have had and will have an impact."

Similarly in New York, two House Democratic freshmen—Lester L. Wolff in the Third District, and Herbert Tenzer in the Fifth—are fighting against an open backlash triggered by fears among Long Island residents that their children will be bused to Negro schools to achieve racial balance. Rumblings in Buffalo and Syracuse may also hurt two other freshman Democrats in the House, James M. Hanley and Richard D. McCarthy.

Brooks in Danger

In Massachusetts, according to observers, there is a growing possibility that a backlash will develop and damage the Republican candidate for the Senate, Attorney General Edward R. Brooke, a Negro, despite the fact that his opponent, former Gov. Endicott Peabody, is a descendant of an abolitionist and is closely identified with civil rights causes. It could turn a close race into an unexpected Peabody victory.

The backlash may also provide Republicans with decisive votes in places where there have been no demonstrations but where fears and resentments nevertheless exist.

This is true in some rural areas, such as the 10th District in Ohio, and in contests for normally Republican seats captured by Democrats in the landslide of 1964. Most of the Democrats won by narrow margins, and Louis Harris, the pollster, recently declared that in contests involving some 45 freshman Democratic seats, the white backlash issue "could have an effect in 20."

A check of nearly all these races suggests that the actual number facing possibly important losses on the race issue would be somewhat less, perhaps 10 or 12, though most of them have the same record on civil rights and voted for open occupancy in the civil rights bill of 1966.

Among the most vulnerable are Mr. Tenzer, Mr. Wolff, Mr. Stalbaum, Representative Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana, Representative Thomas C. McGrath of New Jersey, Representative John J. Gilligan of Ohio, Representative George W. Grider of Tennessee, Representative Andrew Jacobs Jr. of Indiana and Representative Ken W. Dyal of California.

The backlash comes in many forms, but the most common, according to Congressmen, is in private conversation and in quiet moves by the opposition. It is rarely baldly stated on the platform. Said Mr. Hamilton:

"Questions are put to you at political gatherings. Haven't we done enough for the Negro? somebody will ask. Then there's the whisper approach, in front of plant gates, in local taverns and pool halls. That's where they begin calling me names.

"It comes up most anywhere, but as far as political impact is concerned it's awfully hard to measure. But I think that for Democrats it's as dangerous as any issue in the election in terms of changing votes."

Running Hard

Mr. Hamilton, running hard in southern Indiana territory where the Republicans dominated for years, said his stand on civil rights was clearly on the record but that this time "it's an issue I just don't talk about."

In the south, the backlash appears to be stronger than ever. Here, however, the Republicans will probably be hurt rather than helped, particularly in governorship races in Georgia, Alabama and Arkansas, and in their bid for Congressional seats in Georgia and North Carolina.

The Republicans may benefit in the Florida governorship race, where the Democratic nominee, Mayor Robert King High of Miami, has been rapidly backpedaling from the Johnson Administration, and in Tennessee, where blue collar resentment could damage George W. Grider.

ative Republicans and Southern Democrats in an attack on the forcing of racial balance through the busing of pupils. They have also contributed to attempts to slow down Federal efforts to desegregate schools, and, at least in the Senate, they remained absent or silent during the debate over the civil rights bill of 1966.

'Number One Issue'

A high White House source declared:

"I actually feel that the number one issue is the backlash, even though it's hard to talk about."

Alexander E. Barkan, director of the Political Education Committee of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, said:

"Our problem now is race. This is the thing that bothers us."

There is apprehension and caution everywhere. An upstate New York freshman Democrat in the House, Joseph Y. Resnick, said he did not think the backlash would materialize in his district and that the racial issue ranked well below "economic and foreign policy issues as a factor in this campaign." Many agree with him, but few are taking any chances.

One Congressman, for example, who is heavily favored to be re-elected, said he had considered sending copies of a speech supporting open occupancy to his constituents but then had thought the better of it.

"I put the thing in my desk," he said. "None of my constituents wants to think about the issue, let alone hear about it."

Representative Tena Roncalio, the Democratic candidate for the Senate in Wyoming, has developed a double-barreled response to ward off retaliation. He acknowledges that he voted for the civil rights bill of 1966 in the House, but he also tells worried constituents that he supported an amendment to the bill that would have penalized persons who crossed state lines and incited violence.

Given the existence of the backlash, the key question is where it will surface long enough and dramatically enough to switch votes, persuade people to stay home and otherwise provide what one observer called "that little extra irritant" that means so much in a close election.

The available evidence suggests that if the backlash has any potency at all, it will be important in areas where there have been demonstrations or where there is some other local issue crystallizing the race issue, in some marginal districts and in the South.

In the first category, the showcase is Illinois, where two long-time Democratic incumbents, Senator Paul H. Douglas and Representative Roman C. Pucinski of Chicago's 11th District are in trouble, partly because of repeated racial demonstrations in and around Chicago, and, in Mr. Pucinsky's district, partly because of fears of an influx of Negroes in all-white neighborhoods.

Governor Brown Hurt

In California, the disturbances in San Francisco and Los Angeles and strong voter sentiment against open housing have hurt Gov. Edmund G. Brown in his campaign against Ronald Reagan. Mr. Reagan has not openly exploited the issue, but observers believe that he does not have to. He is likely to profit anyway, perhaps enough to win.

The racial issue could also be decisive in some close California Congressional races, despite the hope of incumbent Democrats that the backlash will be aimed largely at Mr. Brown and not themselves.

Representative Harlen Hagan, whose challenger in the 18th District is the former Olympic decathlon star, Bob Mathias, is particularly vulnerable. So is a liberal Democratic Representative, James C. Corman, who received a mere 50.5 per cent of the vote in 1964, and whose opponent, Robert C. Cline, a Conservative, has openly opposed the Johnson Administration's fair housing proposals.

There is evidence that racial demonstrations could have a crucial impact as well in Wisconsin, where Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama scored well

Results Indicate Moderate Republicans Can Extend Their Role in Big City

NYT 11-10-66

By JOHN HERBERS

The backlash vote in Tuesday's elections was highly erratic, but the frontlash, the Negro vote, showed a high degree of sophistication and selectivity, an analysis of the voting revealed yesterday.

Negroes, who voted in a bloc for President Johnson in 1964, paid little attention to party lines this year. They split tickets in selecting candidates who supported their interests, but they also divided their votes in some races in which both candidates had taken a strong stand on civil rights.

Thus, moderate Republicans, the voting showed, can cut into the Negro vote in the big cities even when they are running against liberal Democrats.

In Virginia, the two Democratic candidates for the Senate were elected. Senator Harry F. Byrd Jr. is a conservative who has voted against civil rights legislation. William B Spong Jr. is a moderate who has openly courted the Negro vote.

About 91 per cent of the Negroes participating in the Virginia election voted for Mr. Spong. But only 18 per cent voted for Senator Byrd. The rest supported Senator Byrd's opponent, who had been more liberal than the Senator on civil rights.

The Michigan Outcome

In the Michigan Senate race, the majority of Negroes voted for G. Mennen Williams, a liberal Democrat who had been closely identified with the Negro cause. But the winner, Senator Robert P. Griffin, a Republican, also had supported civil rights. He drew 26 per cent of the Negro vote, which helped provide his margin of victory.

In California, the Republican candidate for Governor, Ronald Regan, had been closely identified with the backlash vote. Only 6 per cent of the Negroes voted for him.

In Massachusetts, 86 per cent of the Negroes voted for Edward W. Brooke, who will be the first Negro Senator since Reconstruction. But only 39 per cent of the Negroes voted for Mr. Brooke's Republican running mate in the Governor's race, Gov. John A. Volpe, who is white and less identified with the Negro cause.

These estimates of the Negro voting patterns were supplied by the Columbia Broadcasting Company's Vote Profile Analysis as obtained from key precincts in each state.

While the Negro voting followed a pattern throughout the nation, the white backlash varied greatly from state to state.

In 37 Congressional districts in which white resistance to integrated housing and other Negro gains was an issue, only 15 of those identified as backlash candidates were elected.

In the majority of these districts, the backlash was considered a contributing but not necessarily the deciding factor. For example, in Memphis, liberal Democratic George W. Grider, the incumbent and the loser, was the target of several charges including rising prices, association with President Johnson and the backlash.

There was evidence, too, of reverse reaction to the backlash. In Maryland, for instance, Negroes and well-to-do whites teamed up to defeat George P! Mahoney, the Democratic candidate for Governor who ran almost solely on the slogan, "Your home is your castle—protect it."

In Arkansas, Jim Johnson, an arch segregationist, won the Democratic primary for Governor in a strong protest against the civil rights policies of the Federal Government. But by the time the election came around, a reaction to the nominee had set in among whites who favored segregation but did not believe Mr. Johnson was generally qualified to be Governor.

The returns from Massachusetts showed virtually no backlash against Mr. Brooke. His stand on civil rights was not as strong as that of his opponent, Endicott Peabody.

But the backlash was strong in other areas such as Illinois, where it helped in the Senate victory of Charles H. Percy, Republican, who did not seek the backlash vote but received it because of his party affiliation.

Polls taken before the election showed that whites believe Republicans will do more than Democrats to slow civil rights.

Alabama party drops 'white supremacy' tag

By Ray Jenkins
Special correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Birmingham, Ala.

The Alabama Democratic Party has long been torn by a bitter rivalry between moderate and conservative factions, making it the unruly bad boy of state parties. Now the state party has taken a dramatic turn toward closer alignment with the policies of the national party.

The unexpected action came Jan. 22 when the State Democratic Executive Committee voted to remove the words "white supremacy" from the party's official slogan which has been printed on ballots in Alabama for 62 years. The committee's vote has these far-reaching ramifications:

- It makes a clear and unequivocal invitation for Alabama's tens of thousands of newly enfranchised Negro voters to join the white moderates of the state in voting Democratic.
- It may frustrate efforts of militant Negro civil-rights groups to organize third parties, which would fractionate the Negro vote.
- It may force the last remaining conservatives who still call themselves Democrats out of the party and pave the way for a traditional alignment along Democratic-Republican lines.
- It substantially strengthens the position of Democratic moderates by alienating from the party the hard-core segregationists who insisted that the "white supremacy" slogan be kept.
- It reduces the risk of Alabama politics polarizing into black and white parties.

Decisive victory

Saturday's vote represents a decisive victory of the state's loyalist Democrat faction —those who want a closer tie with the national party—over the states' rights faction, which is hostile to the national party.

In 1948 the conservatives captured control of the state party machinery and nominated a slate of presidential electors pledged to "Dixiecrat" candidates. The two factions have warred in every presidential race since.

In 1960 the struggle was so close that the state elected a mixed slate of loyalist and states' rights presidential electors. This meant that John F. Kennedy had to settle for only 5 of the state's 11 electoral votes.

Last year a slate of unpledged electors was chosen with the backing of the state's segregationist Governor, George C. Wallace. Republicans carried the state for Barry Goldwater, however, after the unpledged electors refused to campaign.

Negroes serve notice

Against this background, the Birmingham vote represents an unprecedented assertion of loyalist dominance of state party affairs in modern times.

Many weeks ago Negro leaders in the state served notice they would encourage Negroes to boycott the Democratic Party unless the offending label were removed. The state's moderate Attorney General, Richmond Flowers, joined in the demand.

States rights' leaders promptly replied that they would fight any attempt to change the party slogan.

The first order of business when the committee met in a crowded ballroom of a Birmingham hotel was to fill vacancies on the 72-member party governing body. In the first vote a loyalist was seated over a states' righter by a vote of 36 to 28. In rapid fire four more loyalists were elected to vacant seats, establishing a clear majority.

Key motion offered

Then committeeman Charles McKay rose and moved to strike the words "white supremacy" from the party emblem. He said Alabama had to acknowledge a changing political climate and warned that "we cannot take a stick and drive 150,000 or 175,000 votes out of the Democratic Party." Mr. McKay called for only 15 minutes of debate and a secret ballot on his motion.

The states' rights committeemen roared in protest at this tactic, and committeeman Leonard Wilson—an official of the segregationist White Citizens Council—demanded an open vote so the state "would know how each member voted on the nigger question."

State chairman Roy Mayhall, a leading loyalist, overruled this demand. The states' righters then asked for a roll-call vote on Judge Mayhall's ruling, and this turned out to be the only record vote they were able to secure during the rest of the day; the committee upheld the chairman by a vote of 39 to 32.

Beaming with the confidence of the unequivocal backing of the committee loyalists, Judge Mayhall took great liberties with the power of the chair in stamping out every parliamentary brush fire the states' righters were able to start.

Request defended

As the brief debate got under way, Sam Venable declared he would vote to remove the "white supremacy" motto "because a man doesn't have a right to judge his fellow man. That's God's right alone."

On the other side, committeeman Earl Goodwin of Selma contended that the retaining of the slogan would not drive the Negroes out of the party because "they have no other place to go. But we're gonna run a lot more people out of the Democratic Party into the Republican Party by changing it."

Then the vote came, and the slogan was stricken from the party emblem by a voice vote. Moments after the action was taken, Sidney Smyer Jr. took the floor to announce he was resigning from the committee in protest over the refusal of the committee to hold a record vote. He stalked out of the ballroom.

'Trained group . to do the job'

Almost as if to show its good faith in welcoming the Negroes into the party fold, the loyalists beat down a desperate plea by the states' rights group to allow county parties to choose candidates by convention rather than primary election. This proposal was designed to rescue white Democratic office holders in black-belt counties where Negroes now have voting majorities.

As the meeting drew to a close, Albert Brewer, Speaker of the state House of Representatives and a close political ally of Governor Wallace, submitted a "statement of principle" embracing most of the states rights' philosophy on centralized government, local control of juries and the voting process, and repression of communism at home and abroad.

"Governor Wallace assisted in the preparation of this resolution and asked that I introduce it," Mr. Brewer said.

It was but a gesture of conciliation in the name of party unity.

This was the only visible hand the Governor took in the day's dramatic events. He was staying in a private room in the same hotel where the committee was meeting, and it was rumored that he might speak to the committee. But when the meeting ended, he promptly left the hotel without giving his views on what had taken place.

The Governor has stated previously that he fears that a strong two-party system in Alabama might mean competition for the Negro vote as it now exists on the national level. The coming general election may tell whether his fears are well-grounded.

The "white supremacy" slogan now goes off the Democratic ballot on a note of great irony:

In the last race that it was used—the 1964 presidential election—Negroes of Alabama went to the polls in overwhelming numbers to vote under the "white supremacy" emblem while states' rights-minded whites, in nearly as overwhelming proportions, voted for Barry Goldwater running under the Alabama Republican slogan, "America First."

POVERTY

Despite emancipation, the average Negro male has "remained a semi-slave," deprived of the emotional and economic security to play his proper role at the head of the family.

The Absent Father Haunts the Negro Family

By C. ERIC LINCOLN

UNDER pressure of law, public opinion and Negro militancy, progress in civil rights has reached the point where many Americans assume that the practical end of discrimination is only a matter of time. But even the end of formal discrimination falls short of the distant goal: full integration of the Negro into American life. Nor can true integration be achieved until the nation—and the Negro—solves a crucial and immediate problem: how to "Americanize" the fragile, fractured Negro family.

The Negro in America was never a "black Anglo-Saxon," though sometimes he tried to be. He was never simply "another ethnic group" to be assimilated into the mainstream. His family structure is unique in American society.

The U.S. family is primarily patriarchal. The husband and father is the chief breadwinner, carrying the responsibility for his wife and children. Even in families where husband and wife supposedly share equally in making decisions, our society regards the male as "more equal." The law defines this relationship; custom supports and rewards it. But the majority of Negro families do not follow the U.S. custom and are appropriately penalized. Because women have assumed primary responsibility as head of the family, the matriarchal Negro household is at a distinct disadvantage in competing for its rightful share of benefits offered by American society.

About 25 per cent of Negro families are headed by women who have no husbands. These are families where the male is absent because of divorce, separation or desertion, and do not include families with illegitimate children which have never included a male parent.

The easy explanation of the shattered Negro family puts the blame on the Negro male, caricatured as shiftless and lazy. A more socially acceptable reason attributes the matriarchal family structure to superaggressive females. In fact, the blame rests on the horrors of a slave society which stripped the Negro male of his masculinity and condemned him to a eunuchlike existence in a culture which venerates masculine primacy.

THERE are no discontinuities in history. Negroes today (like any other people) are largely the product of yesterday. And American slavery, the "yesterday" of the American Negro, ended only 100 years ago. For 250 years before emancipation, slavery ordered the lives, the thinking and the behavior of white people in one way, and of Negroes in quite another.

American slavery was a different institution from contemporary slavery in South America, Portugal, Africa, or from ancient slavery in Greece and Rome. It developed its own institutionalized values uniquely designed to promote its own ends. Its peculiar impingement upon the Negro in America inescapably conditioned his values, his behavior and his future.

When Negroes were slaves, neither the law nor the slave owners recognized marriage between slaves. Males of prime physical condition were mated with females, like so many cattle. Children were left with the mother, giving the Negro mother an early, exclusive interest in the family and forcing upon her full responsibility for its (Continued on Page 172) care. In those instances where a male and female were permitted to live together longer than necessary for procreation, the Negro father (he could hardly be called a husband) had absolutely no control over his family or its fortunes. Children were seized and sold. Often the father himself was sold away from his family, never to see them again.

The psychology of castration was viciously applied in other ways, too. No Negro man was given a title of respect, a practice which continues in much of the rural South today. A Negro man was simply "Sam," "Jim," or frequently "boy," no matter what his age. He was never "Mister." If he was "living with a woman"—the nearest thing to marriage—he was known as "Hattie's Sam" or "Mandy's Jim," again denying him a position as head of the family. And if the white man wanted Hattie or Mandy for himself, the Negro male had to step aside; interference as a "husband" meant severe punishment and, not infrequently, death.

When the Negro was freed from bondage all the laws Congress could muster were not effective in wholly transferring him from the category of slave to the category of citizen.

The slaves were freed without any provision for their economic or social well-being. They were almost totally uneducated, for to have educated a slave was a criminal offense. They had no money and no homes. And they were concentrated in a politically and economically distressed society hostile to their presence as freedmen. Even those who made their way to the North quickly found themselves unwelcome, for as indigents with low skills they threatened to glut the unskilled labor market and become a burden on the tax-paying citizenry.

Because of her peculiar relationship to the white woman as a servant, and because she was frequently the white man's mistress, the Negro woman occasionally flouted the rules of segregation. Her impunity was by no means absolute, but because she often reigned supreme in the white man's kitchen and nursery she could, in times of crisis, "talk to the man" and get concessions that made life a little more bearable for herself and her children.

The practice of sending the Negro woman to do business with the white man became quickly established in the Negro-white pattern of relations. In the ruptured economy of the postwar South, Negro women were frequently paid more than their menfolk and they could ordinarily find jobs in domestic service while their men walked the streets looking for work.

"Freedom" did not improve the image of the Negro male or give him a sense of security as head of the family. He remained a semi-slave, and his slavery was rooted in the centuries he had spent in America.

If you want to understand his hatreds, his resentments, his castration as a husband and father, look back 100 years. And if you ask why in 100 years he has not overcome the past, it is because the past has never died: every day, every hour of that 100 years of semi-freedom has had to be rewon day by day from the prejudice which still promotes, openly or covertly, the old ways of slavery. The Negro did not earn rewards for being manly, courageous or assertive, but for being accommodating—for fulfilling the stereotype of what he has been forced to be.

We may note, in the interest of keeping perspective, that some stable Negro families with male heads existed before and after slavery. Before the Civil War, some free Negroes in the South and the North maintained family structures and customs as closely analogous to those in the prevailing white culture as circumstances would permit. A few upper-class Negro families, mostly along the Atlantic Coast, have an unbroken tradition of more than a 100 years of social stability and cultural progress. And in the Deep South a handful of Negro families that date to slavery, or the first decades after emancipation, testify to the Negro's determined attempt to overcome the scars of thralldom.

THE symptoms of the Negro family's enduring sickness are everywhere evident today.

The Negro crime rate is higher by far than the national average. The rate of illegitimacy is higher—regardless of the inconsistency of reporting procedures—and may be as high as 25 per cent. Negro drug addiction, especially among juveniles, is much higher than among whites—dramatic evidence of the attempt to escape the rigors of living in a society which for them bears little promise of a better future. The percentage of Negro high-school dropouts, again far above the national average, reflects the same sense of Negro hopelessness.

This is social sickness of epidemic proportions, and it spreads with the steady deterioration of the Negro family.

As the basic unit of socialization for the young, the family needs the presence of both parents if children are to learn the values and expectations of society. But socialization is a continuing experience which affects not only children, but parents as well. A "family man" is much less likely to lapse into criminal activity than one without ties and responsibilities.

The absent father has not been, until recently, a particularly disturbing factor among Negroes themselves (except for educated Negroes who were particularly sensitive to the white man's blanket charge of racial immorality). Any male in the average Negro family might function as a father-figure: uncles, older brothers, grandfathers, even cousins. Similarly a grandmother or aunt was frequently "mama" to a brood of children not biologically her own.

Television has been one factor in sensitizing the Negro child to the fact that his family is different. Another increasingly important factor is the integrated school. In their association with white children from complete families, Negro kids learn early that something is different about their own households. This awareness is sharpened even further by white teachers who have Negro pupils for the first time. As a Negro teacher in a newly integrated school explained it: "My white colleagues get so frustrated when they ask little brown Johnny, 'What does your father do?' and Johnny says he doesn't know. Then they ask, 'Well, Johnny, what does your father look like? Is he big and tall?' and Johnny says he doesn't know. And finally they say, 'Well, all right, Johnny, what is your father's name?' And Johnny says he doesn't know."

The divorce rate among Negro families is 5.1 per cent, compared to 3.8 per cent among whites. But divorces are expensive, and the rate of desertion—the poor man's divorce—is even higher. In many cases, the psychological strain of being a member of a family he cannot support because of unemployment or lack of skills is too much for the Negro husband, and he simply disappears. More often he "deserts" so that his family may become eligible for relief payments, since the family is often better off on relief than depending on the uncertainties of a job. In any event, only a minority of Negro children will complete high school in a two-parent home.

Among middle-class Negroes the battered male ego is frequently a factor in divorce or separation. The Negro professional is in actual or vicarious contact with the American mainstream. He knows his white counterpart is the chief breadwinner and head of the family in his home, and the Negro is acutely sensitive to the possibility of his own failings in these respects.

As tangible goods accumulate, and increasingly important decisions are made, most Negro men become restive and uncomfortable if they are married to women who outearn them, and who assume the prerogatives of family leadership as a corollary to their earning power. In Atlanta, for example, I asked a young Negro woman, a teacher, "Who is head of the family at your house?" She thought for a moment, then answered: "Well, Jack is now, but when I get my raise, I'll be head, because I'll be making $27 more than he will."

The problem is considerably more formidable than such naiveté, I assure you. The Negro female has had the responsibility of the Negro family for so many generations that she accepts it, or assumes it, as second nature. Many older women have forgotten why the responsibility devolved upon the Negro woman in the first place, or why it later became institutionalized. And young Negro women do not think it is absurd to reduce the relationship to a matter of money since many of them probably grew up in families where the only income was earned by their mothers; their fathers may not have been in evidence at all.

Even in middle-class Negro families where the husband earns more than his wife, the real cement holding the marriage may be status and "appearances" rather than a more fundamental attachment. The Negro wife who grew up in a matriarchal home finds it difficult to assent to male leadership in the family; the Negro husband with a similar family history may be over-anxiously insistent on male prerogatives in order to align his family in what he conceives to be the American tradition.

I know a prominent professor in Atlanta who has taught there for 15 years while his wife worked as a teacher in her hometown several hundred miles away. They see each other at Christmas and for a brief period at the end of his summer term. This respectable arrangement obviates, or at least postpones, the problem of who will be head of the family—at the price of maintaining a one-parent household.

THE task of giving the Negro husband and father a status in keeping with the larger society requires a basic change in established patterns of Negro education, training and employment.

More Negro women go to college than men, just the reverse of the white educational pattern. Six per cent of all female professionals are Negroes, while just a shadow over 1 per cent of all male professionals are Negroes. Negro females do better in school too, probably reflecting the low incentive of the Negro male who frequently feels that even if he graduates, he still won't be getting anywhere.

The long tradition of educating the girls in the Negro family is rooted in the system of segregated employment which limited sharply the Negro male's prospects of finding a job commensurate with college training. In the typical Negro family the boys leave school and go to work early, frequently pooling their earnings for the education of their sisters. The process inevitably produces a pronounced imbalance in the ratio of educated women to educated men, reinforcing the disproportionate power and prestige of the Negro woman in the family.

"The working husband is usually the key to family stability"—Above, a youth enrolled in the Job Corps training program.

Having to "marry down," if she marries at all, is a common experience of the Negro woman and one which perpetuates the matriarchal pattern while fostering dissatisfaction, desertion and divorce. For that reason, certain Negro colleges are famous as hunting grounds for eligible men, and the tuition of many an indigent medical school student has been paid by the doting parents of aspiring daughters.

The ratio of Negro college men to women is changing slowly as employment opportunities for Negro men are broadened. In time, the existing disparity as a distinctive feature of Negro life may disappear, but not until Negroes can try for success in fields closed to them for so long, and not until the incentives of Negro youth can be sharply increased.

The problem of education is, of course, interwoven with the question of jobs. Since 1930, the ratio of Negro unemployment to white unemployment has hovered steadily at about two to one.

The working husband of any race is usually the key to family stability; when the husband loses his job it represents the point at which the family may begin to deteriorate. His loss of self-esteem, the inability to support his family, dependence upon some social agency or the wife's earnings—all these factors generally presage more difficult problems to come. In the case of the Negro family, with its historic weaknesses and the tentative nature of male leadership, a prolonged period of unemployment can be disastrous. The family may break up completely and in the long run society has to pay.

THE problem is far larger than the individual Negro family; it is bigger than the limited resources of the Negro lower class, which is most affected. The Johnson Administration, using the pioneering report on the Negro family by Daniel P. Moynihan as a point of departure, has recognized the dimensions of the crisis and inaugurated the most comprehensive series of social rehabilitation programs ever designed by the Federal establishment.

Even that will not be enough. The Government can make available better schools, better housing and better opportunities for employment. It can enforce the laws protecting the franchise and the right to public accommodations. But the Government cannot establish a pattern of family relationships which will foster the values needed to make all this meaningful and effective. Only the Negro can save his family. The substantive help of law and the Government is essential, of course, but the incentive, the motivation which can transform the Negro predicament into a shining achievement of the Great Society must come from within the group.

The white man destroyed the Negro family and kept it weak by preserving the psychology of slavery, thinly disguised as racial discrimination and prejudice. But the white man cannot give back the values he took away.

For years, myopic but well-meaning whites have been challenging the Negro to pull himself up by his own bootstraps, even though the Negro didn't have either boots or straps. The white man was looking at his own boots and imagining the Negro owned a pair, too. The "straps" of the Negro's family problem are not encouraging, but he must work with what he has.

'You Don't Have A Daddy'

In the typical American family, the father is breadwinner and boss—or is made to think he is. But Negro families, says the author, are typically matriarchal, not patriarchal; in the actual or psychological absence of a man "who wears the pants," many Negro children grow up without ever having known a father. One such child was comedian Dick Gregory, in whose autobiography, "Nigger" (written with Robert Lipsyte), the following passage appears:

It was on a Thursday, the day before the Negro payday. The eagle always flew on Friday. The teacher was asking each student how much his father would give to the Community Chest. On Friday night, each kid would get the money from his father, and on Monday he would bring it to the school. I decided I was going to buy me a Daddy right then. I had money in my pocket from shining shoes and selling papers, and whatever Helene Tucker pledged for her Daddy I was going to top it. And I'd hand the money right in. I wasn't going to wait until Monday to buy me a Daddy.

I was shaking, scared to death. The teacher opened her book and started calling out names alphabetically.

"Helene Tucker?"

"My Daddy said he'd give two dollars and fifty cents."

"That's very nice, Helene. Very, very nice indeed."

That made me feel pretty good. It wouldn't take too much to top that. I had almost three dollars in dimes and quarters in my pocket. I stuck my hand in my pocket and held onto the money, waiting for her to call my name. But the teacher closed her book after she called everybody else in the class.

I stood up and raised my hand.

"What is it now?"

"You forgot me."

She turned toward the blackboard. "I don't have time to be playing with you, Richard."

"My Daddy said he'd . . ."

"Sit down, Richard, you're disturbing the class."

"My Daddy said he'd give . . . fifteen dollars."

She turned around and looked mad. "We are collecting this money for you and your kind, Richard Gregory. If your Daddy can give fifteen dollars you have no business being on relief."

"I got it right now, I got it right now, my Daddy gave it to me to turn in today, my Daddy said . . ."

"And furthermore," she said, looking right at me, her nostrils getting big and her lips getting thin and her eyes opening wide, "we know you don't have a Daddy."

Helene Tucker turned around, her eyes full of tears. She felt sorry for me. Then I couldn't see her too well because I was crying, too.

"Sit down, Richard."

And I always thought the teacher kind of liked me. She always picked me to wash the blackboard on Friday, after school. That was a big thrill, it made me feel important. If I didn't wash it, come Monday the school might not function right.

"Where are you going, Richard?"

I walked out of school that day, and for a long time I didn't go back very often. There was shame there.

The Poor Don't Want To Be Middle-Class

by Robert Coles, M.D.

Research Psychiatrist to the Harvard University Health Services has written extensively about the current social scene.

CURRICULUM CONSULTATION SERVICE HAS BEEN ESTABLISHED BY THE BANK STREET COLLEGE OF EDUCATION UNDER A CONTRACT WITH THE EQUAL EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES PROGRAM OF THE U.S. OFFICE OF EDUCATION

Wars have a way of spreading. Poverty is now our declared domestic enemy, and we are presumably fighting to save its victims, the poor. Yet some of the poor talk as if they themselves were being attacked, while many of their allies - professors, organizers and activists of one sort or another - say that the poverty program is pitifully inadequate for such a rich nation, and worse, a number of its efforts are insulting to the citizens it aims to help.

In a recent example, a Job Corps center at Camp Kilmer, New Jersey, was severely criticized by a group of consultants chosen to evaluate it. The private company running the center was accused of using harshly authoritarian procedures geared toward exacting excessive obedience and compliance. "At Kilmer," the report said, "it appears that a kind of middle-class colonialism is occurring, with the corpsmen subjected to the value system of the Kilmer staff."

This was by no means the first such complaint. Other centers have experienced disturbances, some of them the result of tensions among the recruits themselves, others rising out of angry encounters between the recruits and people from nearby towns. Certain communities have refused even to allow Job Corps camps in their midst, as if the unemployed were some devilish adversary whose mere presence guarantees specific crimes or a vaguely felt contamination. Where the camps have been established it has been claimed that such attitudes from "outside," that is from the middle-class culture, have worked their way through and through the atmosphere and practices of the various projects. As a result, men from the slums, in desperate need of work, have found themselves transported to camps where they face what one report called "a tendency to view corpsmen as culprits, and degrade them in their own estimation;

A failure to understand the nature and 'life styles' of a poverty culture; secrecy and surveillance; and frustrated, angry teachers and group leaders."

Whether such allegations are excessive or even true, the poor and those who patrol their streets or teach them have a long history of barely tolerating one another. Testimony submitted to Congress in support of the National Teachers Corps documented the extremely inadequate quality of teaching in ghetto schools. The very purpose of the corps is that of attracting and training people who would want to work alongside the poor, understand them, and comprehend their assumptions and hopes, rather than compel thei acquiescence to every possible middle-class notion or, failing that, ignore them as both hopeless and undeserving of hope.

In city after city while poor children complain about their schools and the teachers inside them, or ignore all education as irrelevant to the lives they know, their parents protest bitterly the urban-renewal programs that tear down the slums only to scatter the poor and give the rich yet another bonus of land. "Look what they do," a woman in Boston told me recently. "They push us around, then they build their office buildings. The one thing we had was land, and now the're taking it away and throwing us away. You can be sure we won't go anywhere good though - just be moved to suit what the planners want."

What makes that woman so incomprehensible to the urban renewal authorities who claim an earnest wish to advance her cause? Why does she see them as her enemy? Why do some recruits protest bitterly the "attitudes" shown them by their teachers in the Job Corps? Why have I heard Negroes in Southern towns of the tenement blocks of Boston shout their angry defiance at some of the efforts made to "help" them? They come here to be nice," one mother recently told me "but all they want to do is talk at us, and talk at us, and make us into them."

In order to answer such vexing questions many observers have postulated the existence of a "culture of poverty," with a style of life very much its own. Like all categorizations in the social sciences, the value of such a concept depends upon the vision it supplies. If I find that lack of money eventually sets in motion a rather distinct way of looking at the world and living in it, so that everything from child-rearing to religious beliefs and sexual customs fall in line accordingly, then I am up against a situation not - at least immediately - responsive only to infusions of cash.

Conversely, there are and have been poor, even jobless, people in America who nonetheless retain the same outlook (read "attitude" or "culture") characteristic of the more comfortable. Like most who come upon this article, they worry about the future and about their position in the world. They also have the conviction that their worries, harnessed to their hard work, or quest for hard work, will some day be rewarded by what they want: property, security, comfort, gain, the respect of others; the advancement of their children even further, to more property, more security, more comfort, more success even to significant prestige and influence. If they are now poor, if they are barely getting by, they nevertheless try to keep themselves and their homes tidy, their children's faces scrubbed, their confidence in the likelihood of a better day high enough to avoid daily gloom, or the recklessness and apathy which may express it.

Some other Americans find life a different matter. Because of where they live, or how they look, or when their ancestors came here, they are but another generation in a long story of apartness, plunder, mean living and indignity. They number millions, every article on poverty talks about them, and supposedly they now worry us as a nation.

They are in the Appalachian Mountains, or the Mississippi Delta. They are migrant farmers who have no fixed home, city folk by the dense millions who never venture beyond a few slum blocks, or Indians whose "reservations" are a final territorial summation of our record of home-spun colonialism. They are white, black, red; and it cannot be stated often enough that many of them have been here long before the rest of us.

While waves of immigrants came here, to know poverty, eventually to win against it, never to lose that critical feeling that it is possible to win, these others stood by, as slaves, as yeomen on small farms, as tribesmen under attack, as hard-pressed mountaineers hopelessly removed from the centers of commerce - ironically as a consequence of the courage possessed by their pioneer ancestors.

Slowly such people and their descendants got the point: that life is quick and painful; that what is counts more than what will be, because what will be can only be what is; and that hunger, crowded quarters, uncertainty, are inevitable, only to be offset by the precarious pleasures of the moment.

"They keep on telling us, those welfare ladies, to take better care of our money, and save it away, and buy what's the best in the stores, and do like them for dresses, and keep the children in school, and keep our husbands from leaving us. There isn't nothing they don't have a sermon on. They'll tell you it's bad to spend your money on a smoke or a drink; and it's bad to have your kids sleep alongside you in the bed; and you're not supposed to want television because you should be serious with your dollar, and it's wrong for the kids, too; and it's bad for you to let them stay out after dark, and they should study their lessons hard and they'll get way ahead and up there.

"Well, I'll tell you, they sure don't know what it's about, and they can't, not if they come knocking on my door every week until the Lord takes all of us. They have their nice leather shoes, and their smart coats, and they speak the right order of words all right, so I know how many schools they been to. But us? Do they have any idea of what us is about? And let them start at zero the way we do, and see how many big numbers they can become themselves. I mean, if you have got nothing when you're born, and you know you can't get a thing no matter how you tries - well, then you dies with nothing. And no one can deny that arithmetic."

I have connected together several hours of tape-recorded conversation with this woman, a tough, shrewd, fiercely angry, occasionally humorous mother of seven children. Nor does she want to be anything but warm and kind to her children, even when she isn't. "I tries to give them what I can when they're little, so when they gets older and leaves they'll have a few good times to look back on."

While some of us marvel at such "folk wisdom" - in songs, stories and spirituals - those who daily pay the terrible price of its acquisition have other things to do. Life is an unending struggle for survival, and each day's shaky victory in that struggle a mere prelude to further hardship.

"They just don't understand" - I hear words like that almost daily in my work. They usually are followed by other words: "They just don't understand what it's like. You are born in a building where it's cold, and the rats keep you company all day and you're lucky if they don't eat you at night, because they're as hungry as you. Then the food, it's not always around when you want it, and you don't have money to buy what you do want. Then you go to those schools, and the teachers, they looks down on you, and makes you think you has done something wrong for being born. They shout and make faces, and they treat you like dirt and then tell you to be a doctor or a lawyer; if you just go to the library and stay in school and be neat, that's all it takes. Once in a while lately they want to take you on a trip crosstown, and show you a museum or something. They tell you that you haven't got any pictures at home, so there, take a look and now you own them, and man, you're rich.

"My father, he tried, and he tried. My mother, she tried, too. My father, he would put his head on the kitchen table and he would cry, all six foot three of him would cry. And my mother would tell him to stop, and say it wasn't his fault; and we would stay alive somehow. But my brothers and I, we knew she wasn't so sure. She tried to make it easy for us by lying, but we knew. Now they all tell us to level with them, and work hard and we'll get ours, what we always deserved."

It is unfair to deny that youth, and his parents, their strength and determination. It is also unfair to overlook how eroded their lives have become - by illness and idleness, by fearfulness and insulting dependency upon the slimmest kind of relief checks.

It is a hard job, trying to do justice to such lives. Those of us who try come from another land. We have gained literacy, work, an ongoing sense of usefulness and purpose, a professional life. No matter how hard we strive to observe and learn how those "others" live we have our own past, our own experiences to fall back upon, even when we try to forget them.

Moreover, we can always leave; whether in days or months or years, somehow we know we can always leave, that we belong, if only out of our past, elsewhere. That past - I am speaking of time spent in the "middle-class" world, that elusive miscellaneous yet somehow quite real abstraction - has given us hope and a number of opportunities. Now, whether in Mississippi, Appalachia or Harlem, the same past gives us coherence, and yet, ironically, bewilderment too.

The signs of bewilderment vary. We flee into romantic notions of one sort or another: the poor are the only virtuous or truly strong left; the poor are everything that is weak and destroyed; the poor see the diseases at work in our society, and in fact by their very condition are immune to them; the poor are the wretched, their existence a total judgment on the rest of us.

"You have to watch your step. You have to be nice, but you can't be friendly. You have to be serious, but you can't have a sour face." I heard those words from a Negro mother in New Orleans. She was telling me what she had to tell her children as they left "home" to walk on white streets, shop in white stores, and eventually seek jobs in white companies.

Those who are involved in both the civil-rights struggle and the poverty program also walk a tightrope. Not only may they themselves make unfair generalizations of one sort or another; but from various directions their every move and word will be scrutinized and quite possibly misunderstood, perhaps less by the poor themselves than any of their many appointed and self-appointed "voices." I recently heard one youth in a Boston slum say at a meeting, "Everybody says they speak for us, and they want to speak for us, and they all argue about what we want, but all I know is I don't want to speak for the poor people, I want to get out of it and not be poor. That's what I want and that's what I want to say."

What in fact does happen to those of us who now find ourselves - in a poverty program, a civil-rights project, a ghetto school - face to face with other Americans sure or not sure about what they want, but usually at least sure that they have cause to feel afraid, suspicious, bitter and skeptical? Cannot our very presence, our earnest, honest, generous presence undo the distrust of others? Our lives, after all, are gaining meaning from the work we do. Soon - we hope - those we want to help will see that, and then begin to forgo what we find to be their sullen inertia, or their resentful unwillingness to abide by our rules or customs.

Often enough it is we who become confused, and afterwards candidates for weariness and straightlaced flight. Our strict sense of justice having met up with ungracious, even scornful rebuff, we can no longer give any quarter to the improvident. Yet, such disastrous results are by no means inevitable. To a large extent what happens will depend upon the manner of the meeting, the purpose of the encounter between those in need and those wanting to be of help.

The critical element may be the uncanny sensitivity possessed by people with empty stomachs. They are on their guard, or else they have surrendered totally to one form of oblivion or another, even then retaining a disordered wariness. I have spent a number of years now getting to know Negro and white families in the rural and urban South, in migrant labor camps, and in Northern slums. It is not that these people have inherited some special sociological genius that allows them to see the hard facts of money and power as they operate in the world. It is that the very nature of their lives compels in them a daily confrontation with those facts, even as our lives are shielded in countless ways from the same facts. The more money you have, the more possible it is for you to forget money, turn your attention elsewhere, to "higher" matters.

Perhaps it is better to let a man I have known several years say it. His name is Jim, and he is my age. Jim has no property, no bank account, no car. He works where he can find work, any work. He works hard. He draws relief when he can't find work. He wants his children to have a better life, but all his children can see is his life, the lives of others like him. Why should they think it will ever be better for them?

The school they know is not like the one my children will attend. The teachers in that school - I have visited the classrooms - were once dutiful and eager, then became tired and angry; now, finally, they are indifferent. The school building, like the crumbling walls Jim's children call "home," are a standing reminder to everyone - teacher, children, parents - in the neighborhood that what goes on elsewhere in the America they see on television bears little resemblance to that area's life.

"People say they want to wipe out poverty" - he began with a derisive tone that already anticipated his views. "That's what you hear, but it's a lot of talk, a lot of show, and maybe a little shake of salt here and there. They tell us they want to retrain us. "That's right," they say, 'come on along and we'll get you retrained.'

"But I know how to do all kinds of things already, and I still can't get a job. They don't take but a few colored, trained or untrained. I'm as good a carpenter and electrician as anyone is, but can I get a job? No, sir. No union wants me, and no one will hire me on my own. What is all this poverty thing but plugging up a lot of holes, when you need a new dam?

"They should say: 'O.K. man, we're so rich we don't know what to do with it. We're even flying over to visit the moon and into heaven, we got so much money. So here's what we'll do for you cats. We'll say every one of your children can have food, we have so much of it; and we'll give you a good apartment and a real nice school, and enough money so you won't be crawling on your belly for that relief check business. Then we have some work for you to do. Now you, Jim, we want you to help us build that hospital, or that school building for your kids and your brother's kids. Your're a good builder, Jim; so help us build.' Then I'd have my head up and there wouldn't be anyone who would make me bow it and feel ashamed for sitting around or raking in them leaves.

"Isn't that the way to beat old man poverty, instead of taking some of our kids to a camp and trying to get them to learn something, when they figures after they learn it there still won't be the number of jobs we need? And what about that surplus food you have to beg to get, and saying only when you are older than 65 you can get a doctor for free? Who around here lives that long? They know right well all along that we need more than they're going to give. I see those kids on the block growing up, and they starts giving up around 10, I'd say. They just gives up. And it's because they knows the score, and no man can fool them, I don't care how clever he be.

"They try to, though. Instead of giving us what we need, they try to make us be like them. Why don't they give us what we deserve? We been working for them since the beginning, and for free most of the time. Now it's our turn to get our rights as Americans, and they should let us be as we finds it in our hearts to."

What Jim says many others like him have said, or feel like saying. He wants money and he badly needs money. For his family he wants a home, a good school, medical care. He is not sure that he wants to talk and dress like others in the suburbs do, and he resents any suggestion that he make a change in his speech, his appearance or his style of life as the price for food and cash. He does not see any glory in his condition, but he also can spot in a flash a new attempt to humiliate him. Or, as a tenant farmer in Mississippi once put it for me: "If they really mean to help us, we've been ready so long I can't count the years; but if they're kidding as usual, they won't find me buying an extra tie to go beg."

Is it not time for this nation to guarantee every one of its families an adequate yearly income? Then, at least, we will no longer have hungry and needy people in this land of surfeit. What we will continue to have is the presence of people who are still largely outside our middle-class world, with its widespread emphasis on competition, innovation, individual achievement and constantly increasing consumption. Many of the poor have never found such goals, as well as the cautions and restraints of suburban living, possible or rewarding. They have learned to be open and direct with one another, painfully so to many of us, but from another point of view, honestly so.

The warmth they often give to their young children is not part of a romantic myth. Side by side with the cruelty, impulsivity, deviousness and futility of ghetto life are its fresh and poignant moments, its searing vision - such as I heard from one old woman when I asked her how old she was: "No older now than when I was 15. You're the same age here once you're old enough to know what it's like in the world. Every year is the same thing. I don't think you get older unless you have something different happen to you, or something better."

One by one, at crucial times in our history various immigrant groups have come, to lend a diversity and richness to our culture. Nevertheless, that same culture has plenty of rot in it - cheap abundance, anxious conformity, smug carelessness. Money and work are what the poor people I know demand and need, but I am not so sure that some of the qualities they already have are not in turn needed by the rest of us - the unmasking humor, the caustic distrust of fake morality, hypocritical authority, and dishonest piety. If most of the poor have been terribly crushed by our society, then in other ways so have many from our nervous, acquisitive middle-class.

Perhaps it is impossible for any large group of people to resist the powerful tug of our middle-class society once it decides to extend its welcome. Certainly I know many poor families who want without question what that society offers. They show no interest in rejecting any of it, even those qualities that reformers themselves have spurned, and indeed work with the poor to avoid.

Still, were poverty no longer a rallying ground for behavior, a few of those now in its clutches might resist the worst blandishments of our culture. Once comfortable in the flesh, they would hunger for other things, for vision and coherence, in ways that called upon their distinctive past experiences, and in so doing make us all pricelessly, truly richer. Presumably - though I am not sure - we are striving to have that choice, that kind of possibility for every American child.

SOMETHING FOR EVERYBODY

THE GUARANTEED INCOME: Next Step in Economic Evolution? Edited by Robert Theobald. 233 pp. New York: Doubleday & Co. $4.95.

By LEON H. KEYSERLING

THE central proposition of the Preface and 10 essays in this book is that society, presumably starting in the United States, should guarantee to everyone a socially acceptable level of income. This guaranteed income would not be made available solely to those unable to work for reasons such as age or disability, or debarred from work by involuntary unemployment. It would extend to all, regardless of whether they are or should be "gainfully employed" in the production of goods and services as this term has come to be understood. It would include all who, for reasons of their own, prefer leisure to gainful employment.

I assume that this guaranteed income should be far above the currently defined poverty-income ceiling of $3,000-plus for a family. For while only about 34 million Americans lived in poverty in 1964, another 49 million lived in deprivation, with incomes below the requirements for a "modest but adequate" budget. The concept of what is "modest but adequate" changes with advances in the industrial arts; today, it implies in the U.S. a family income of about $6,000.

Interest in these essays is heightened by the Feb. 4 release of the long-awaited Report of the National Commission on Technology, Automation, and Economic Progress. This Report advocates guaranteed incomes for all, but evidently in the same context as this reviewer, rather than in the different context underlying these essays.

The essays are valuable on several counts, aside from being very readable throughout. The espousal of a guaranteed annual income for all, while not entirely novel, has so little acceptance to date that it should be rated as enterprising and courageous. We do need these virtues today. The position is unassailable that the U.S. economy is already powerful enough to assure a "modest but adequate" standard of living for all our people. In my view, we therefore have a moral obligation to furnish this assurance, and the authors are most commendable in bringing moral considerations to the forefront at a time when they are being seriously neglected in most approaches to economic problems.

Still another merit is that the book brings together a wide range of disciplines; economic and related social policies are too important to be left, even in their technical or professional aspects, to economists alone. The authors' challenge to the conventional economics is telling, notably Meno Lovenstein's. The contributors include four economists (Robert Theobald, Clarence E. Ayers, Lovenstein and Ben B. Seligman); an anthropologist (Conrad M. Arensberg); a psychologist (Robert H. Davis); a psychiatrist (Erich Fromm); an administrator and scholar in the field of culture and technology (Marshall McLuhan); a social-welfare expert (Edward Schwartz); and a conservationist (William Vogt).

MY dissent from the general theme of the volume is partial but vital. When I join in the view that all of our people should be guaranteed a "modest but adequate" income and standard of living, I envisage this as stemming primarily from a full-employment policy coupled with adequate compensation, and secondarily from guaranteed incomes for those not qualified for gainful employment because of age or other disability. But the authors go far beyond this. With probably two exceptions (Mr. Ayers and Mr. Seligman) they appear to relegate far to the rear the goal of sustained full employment and the ever-increasing national output which would result from full utilization of a growing labor force plus an advancing technology. Most of them are mainly interested in incomes, not jobs.

The economic basis of the case is stated simply and with candor by the book's editor, Mr. Theobald, in the Preface, consistently with his voluminous other writings on the same subject. He is a British socio-economist, formerly with the Organization for European Economic Cooperation and now living in New York. As he would have it, the onrush of technology, automation and cybernation is so overwhelming that massive unemployment is utterly unavoidable and full employment a pious dream. This presents to him no difficulties from the viewpoint of available output: advances in industrial techniques are such that, even with only a moderate fraction of the population of working age gainfully employed in the production of conventional goods and services, we will enjoy "an overwhelming abundance" of them. Under these assumptions, it is manifestly more desirable that everybody should live nicely on a guaranteed income rather than that poverty should be the lot of those who cannot be gainfully employed.

In evaluating this case, I am not particularly impressed with the standard argument that income without employment as customarily defined would for motivational and psychological reasons be corrosive of the human spirit. Fromm, McLuhan and Arensberg offer reasons at least worthy of careful consideration to the effect that freedom from the obligation to work, equating with the freedom of every individual to do what he thinks he likes best, might have real value in terms of individual development. Vogt adds the point that the guaranteed income for all would not accentuate the problem of overpopulation. And at least for those who cannot be gainfully employed, Schwartz castigates the "means test" along lines which should help to propel much-needed revision of the prevalent approaches to many current welfare programs which tend to encourage pauperization.

Before going all the way with the authors, we must examine Mr. Theobald's proposition (which most of the others in the group seem to share) that sustained full employment and the ever-increasing production of goods and services which would result as technology advances are neither feasible nor highly desirable. The first difficulty with this proposition is that those among the authors (primarily Mr. Davis and Mr. Seligman) who pick up the task of giving us the facts do not in my view come through convincingly. They offer relevant data with respect to computers and other in- (Continued on Page 34) novations, and valid evidence of long-term acceleration in the rate of increase in output per man-hour worked. But even if they are talking only about the U.S. and its domestic needs, they offer no comprehensive quantitative appraisal as to how long it would take us, even if fully employed, to turn out so much goods and services that we would no longer be concerned about the increased output which would result from sustained full employment.

Let us look at some facts that seem to be most pertinent, first with respect to when we might be able to produce more than we would need or want. The average disposable per-capita income in the U.S. in 1965 was about $2,400, or about $7,500-$8,000 on an average consumer-unit basis. I do not suppose that most of the professors and others who write books would regard a family income of about three times this as more than could be used wisely and well (and without corruption of soul) for the needs and niceties of life, including a trip to Europe now and then. Most of them would aspire toward achieving this income and living standard, if they have not already done so, before they would plunk for "retirement" on a guaranteed income of even $6,000 or thereabouts. In all probability, nonintellectuals would make the same choice with even more alacrity, although I have never noted that the intellectual community is congenitally opposed to more income and "material" things.

DURING the years 1955-1965, U.S. per-capita disposable income in real terms increased less than 23 per cent. On this basis, allowing for compounding, it would take more than five decades for average U.S. incomes and living standards to reach levels which the professors and other writers certainly would not regard as "too high" even now. To attain these levels requires just that much more national production of goods and services on a per-capita basis.

Besides, increased output must serve many purposes other than personal incomes and outlays. It must help to build plant and equipment; finance research; conserve and replenish our neglected natural resources; purify our polluted air and waters; modernize our obsolescent transportation systems; rebuild our decaying cities; rehouse the at least one-sixth of the total population who still live in urban and rural slums; generate the additional hospitals and personnel needed to bring adequate medical care to the two-fifths of our people who do not now obtain it at costs within their means. It must also help to overcome enormous deficiencies in educational plant and teachers, and enable to go to college the half of our young people who have the ability and ambition but lack the means; and support (as far as we can see ahead) immense outlays for defense and space exploration and international policies fraught with great uncertainties. This is not the whole list.

All of these things are paid for, in the final analysis, not with money but with production. One of the writers in the volume, Mr. Ayers, does intimate that the guaranteed income for all would provide the purchasing power to stimulate full production and full employment. But this reverses the core theme of the volume: that the guaranteed income for all is essential because massive unemployment is in the cards, and because output per employed worker will soon be so fabulous that high employment will no longer be needed.

And even if we in the U.S. should reach, 50 years hence, a situation where our production at full employment led to genuine saturation of needs and desires at home, what about the rest of the world? This brings us back to 1966, not forward to 2016. While the rich nations get richer, the poor get poorer. The widening gap threatens us no less than them. The prospect is that, by 1970, there will be a billion people in the world who are literally starving. What should we now and henceforth be doing to help them avoid this, not only with know-how, but also with exports of food and hardware and capital, in immensely increased amounts? Are Africa, Asia and South America shuddering at the prospect of an "overwhelming abundance" of goods and services? Is it the advance of technology which explains their massive unemployment?

Before we even talk about dulling the greatest nonsecret weapon in the world, our soaring productive powers, we should reexamine and reconstruct our worldwide economic policies. The Administration has just done much of this in qualitative terms. But we do not yet realize that the quality of what we do to help those who need help most is quantitative at its very foundation.

In the full perspective of human needs, we have room and to spare for all we can produce at full employment, as far ahead as we can see. It would thus be one of the greatest tragedies in human history, if, when the prophets' dreams of abundance (not surfeit) are for the first time feasible in terms of our productive powers and potentials, we should bury these instead of using them to the hilt.

Nor is there any merit in the argument that we have not the organizing skills, economic tools and experience to assure sustained full employment (and the full production that goes with it) in the U.S. Even with some very deficient policies, and despite the advances of the new technology, we have reduced unemployment from 6.7 per cent in 1961 to 4 per cent now. If 4 per cent, why not 3, or even 2?

I project ahead at a more rapid rate than most other economists the likely advances in productivity, or output per man-hour worked, resulting from technological change. Even so, I estimate that we need, for the decade ahead, an average annual economic growth rate of only about 5 to 6 per cent to absorb all increases in productivity plus a rapidly growing labor force. This is far below the 9 per cent average annual rate of economic growth which we maintained for four years during World War II, despite the dislocation of wartime.

THE utilization of our burgeoning productive powers is not an insoluble problem. It is a relatively easy problem, if we apply to it, in the cause of winning the war against poverty at home and disaster overseas, with the added frosting of large material progress for the rest of us, a modicum of the energy and determination we applied during World War II.

The question may legitimately be posed: If the authors are correct in the limited objective of a guaranteed annual income for those who really cannot be employed, what harm is done by going as much further as they do? My concern is that, by attempting to advance a thesis which seems indefensible when pushed so far, they are undermining their effectiveness in winning acceptance of their more limited and splendid theme: that the American economy is powerful enough, and should be socially-minded enough, to guarantee an American standard of living to all those who really cannot participate in the functioning economy, and also to those who are employed but at substandard wages.

We are now paying to our senior citizens, more than three-quarters of whom live in abject poverty and who constitute about 27 per cent of all the U.S. poor, Social Security benefits averaging half of what they ought to be within five years. We are grossly neglecting the 25 per cent of all the U.S. poor who live in fatherless families, with at least half headed by mothers who cannot or should not work. For these, we should establish decent systems of family allowances, similar to those in some

European countries. We should commence, for the first time, to make large Federal contributions in the general welfare category. Also with Federal contributions, we should greatly improve our unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation systems.

About 60 per cent of the poor are poor because their breadwinners are unemployed, or employed only part-time, or paid substandard wages when employed, or because of some combination of these situations. The remedy here is an adequate, national, full-employment-and-income policy. This type of "guarantee" was really the mandate of the Employment Act of 1946. But we have moved toward its full implementation only with mincing steps. Grafted upon this rather than pursued independently, guaranteed incomes to those who cannot or should not be employed is eminently desirable. This would also enlarge aggregate demand, and thereby stimulate employment to counteract the displacements due to technological advance.

WHAT I urge, in essence, is that we build upon what we have, more courageously and comprehensively than we are now doing. We really have in place the institutions, the machinery and even the stated purposes to build a Great Society, strong and just. We need only to use them.

This seems to me more promising — economically, financially, politically, and psychologically — than to blur the dividing line between evolution and revolution. It may seem appealing to write an entirely new prescription on a white sheet of paper, but entirely "new approaches" are not meritorious per se.

Even the current "war on poverty" suffers from too much bright new experimentalism. Poverty is not a new problem nor even a recent discovery. There is a wealth of revealed experience, both at home and abroad, bearing upon what works toward reducing poverty. The poor should not be made the victims of a farrago of "new approaches."

Too much of the recent and current writing on economic and related social problems seems to manifest the sentiment that nobody will listen unless there are iconoclastic shockers in the story. We have plenty of real economic problems, some requiring drastic solutions, without ranging off into the wild blue yonder. My good friend John K. Galbraith, in his most famous book, "The Affluent Society," made a tremendous contribution in his plea for more attention to the "public sector." Unfortunately, he elected to spice up his text with forays to the effect that economic growth and full employment are no longer essential in an affluent society. I fear that the heritage of this mistake is reflected in the volume under review.

Speculative but remote thinking and writing about the highly improbable would be more welcome were we not now confronted by so many unmet problems and so many aberrations in national policies that call for quick, precision readjustment. The 1967 Federal Budget makes it clear that we are willing, if need be, to cut back on nonessentials in order to finance an expanding war in Vietnam (I imply no dissent from that). But we are not yet willing, through tax increases, to cut back on scores of billions of dollars of wasteful private consumption (and the private investment designed to feed it), in order to finance adequately the most urgent of our domestic public priorities—the very bricks and mortar of a Great Society.

The servicing of these priorities requires intense efforts to expand production, combined with unalloyed determination to allocate the product in accord with what we need most, not what we need least. We have gone too far already on the assumption that stimulating any kind of demand through incontinent tax reductions can turn the trick.

The tasks ahead will require changes in the structure of the labor force and employment, but no surrender of the goal of full employment. It will require many alterations in the structure of demand, but even firmer commitment than we now have to a high enough level of total demand to expand total output even more rapidly than we are now doing.

The development of the economic means suitable to these tasks, and the enlargement of the popular understanding and support which is so essential, call for the best that the intellectual community can offer. If we make long-range budgets of our needs and resources, and use fiscal and other policies sufficiently to redirect our energies in accord with our needs, we can create a Great Society at home, and do our full share toward spreading its seeds among the 3 billion people of the earth.

INCOME DECLINE FOUND IN WATTS

Census in Los Angeles Area Shows Broken Homes Up

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 8 — During the last five years, while most Americans enjoyed increased prosperity, the Negroes and Mexican-Americans in the ghettoes of Los Angeles experienced a decline in family income, employment and housing.

The decline was accompanied by an increase in broken homes.

These were the chief findings of a special census released today by the Department of Commerce. The census had been requested by Dr. Andrew F. Brimmer, Assistant Secretary for Economic Affiars.

Dr. Brimmer was a member of the study group appointed by President Johnson to investigate the riots last summer in Watts and adjoining areas of Los Angeles. He recommended a special survey by the Census Bureau to determine the economic status of people living in those areas.

The riots killed 34 persons, injured more than 1,000 and caused $40-million in property damage.

Consistent Pattern

Dr. Brimmer, a Negro who was recently nominated to the Federal Reserve Board by President Johnson, said the census had revealed a consistent pattern of high unemployment, low income and a high percentage of broken families and substandard housing.

"In south Los Angeles, which contains 250,000 Negroes, about one out of every 10 male workers is unemployed, Dr. Bremmer said.

"The male unemployment rate," he continued, "has declined only one percentage point since the recession year of 1960. Purchasing power of the typical family has declined $400 during a period in which the typical American family's income rose 14 per cent and the typical nonwhite family income jumped 24 per cent."

The census covered a cluster of five predominantly Negro sections, including Watts, in south Los Angeles and an adjoining area containing a high percentage of Mexican-Americans.

In south Los Angeles, median family income, adjusted for price changes, dropped from $5,100 in 1959 to $4,700 in 1965. The decline in Watts specifically was about 2 per cent.

In 1960, according to the census, about 75 per cent of all families in South Los Angeles were married couples living in their own households. By 1965, this proportion had dropped to 70 per cent. The proportion of children living with both parents in the area dropped from 68 to 62 per cent.

The percentage of Negroes in the area increased from 70 to 81 during the five-year period, largely in areas outside of Watts.

About 80 per cent of the residents of South Los Angeles had been living in the city for at least five years. Although a large number of families moved into the area during the five years, a larger number moved out.

Dr. Brinner said this suggested that the more successful families had moved to more desirable neighborhoods and had been replaced by lower income groups moving in from other parts of the state and nation.

The census showed a deterioration in the quality of housing in the area. Dilapidated units increased from 3 to 5 per cent and deteriorating units from 15 to 28 per cent. It was pointed out, however, that these figures were based on individual judgments of those taking the census rather than objective measurements.

The census was based on one in every 10 households in the area, which is considered a reliable sample for such a study.

The male unemployment rate for South Los Angeles was 10.1 in 1965 compared with 11.3 in 1960. Nationally, the unemployment rate for nonwhite males declined from 12 to 6 per cent during the same period.

A more detailed report on the census is to be issued in a few weeks.

Watts Nudges Us Again

A minor explosion of human violence in Watts (Los Angeles) by young Negroes and Mexicans quickly was brought under police control. Whether the riot would have reached major proportions is unknown. Left alone, it might have done so.

The reactions were the usual ones.

There was the professional response that noted few, if any, improvements had been made in conditions that triggered the massive violence of last summer. There still are the jobless, the hundreds of unemployed, out-of-school youngsters, ranging from 14 to the early twenties.

There also was the response from those who see the slum riots through the eyes of prejudice or who cannot understand why all slum violence and discontent is not solved by police arrests and jail sentences. These are the most blind of all.

Arduous Program

These critics are right in that the problem is one that involves police as a major part of what, of necessity, must be a long, arduous program. Chicago, for example, thus far has avoided trouble comparable with that of New York's Harlem and Brooklyn's huge slum area. This has been made possible by police who have been educated not merely to the role they must play as law enforcement officers — but also to their role as factors in a long standing, long neglected social problem.

Dr. Martin Luther King has moved to Chicago to conduct a summer campaign against slum housing and slum conditions. Chicago police officials and others involved in social and welfare work already have met with him and his staff. This may not prevent violence

Dr. Martin Luther King has moved to Chicago to conduct a summer campaign against slum housing and slum conditions. Chicago police officials and others involved in social and welfare work already have met with him and his staff. This may not prevent violence. But it is a common-sense beginning.

Police everywhere are a cross-section of life, as is any organization in our country. They include some with racial prejudices. But police forces, if led and informed in depth about why the problem of slums is acute and dangerous, will react with much more effectiveness than those who have no leadership whatever.

The slum problem is easy to oversimplify. This is dangerous because it is a complex, human condition. But in general, it is a situation in which a great many persons are absolutely helpless to cope with the facts of life and the environment in which they live. They are helpless to do so for many reasons, all related. Most of them are from the South's rural revolution. This includes the collapse of the old cotton economy with its system of tenancy and sharecropping.

Another Facet

Another facet of the overall problem dates to the end of the Second World War. This country's war production, which kept the British, the Russians, the Free French and smaller allied units in weapons, uniforms, trucks, food, ships and aircraft, was massive beyond belief. Hundreds of thousands of persons, men and women, "bucked rivets" and did other semi-skilled jobs in aircraft plants. Hundreds of thousands worked in shipyards and in the thousands of plants that turned out weapons, ammunition, and the varied tools of war.

The mobility of peoples in that period was spectacular to see in the form of sprawling trailer homes and in the crowded occupancy of all sorts of housing where the work went on. Once war ended the productive lives of several million Americans slacked off and slowly came to an end.

The South's out-migration had been stepped up as early as 1914. It continued. Today the slums have second, even third generations that came out of the South to do labor or semi-skilled jobs that no longer exist.

This is merely part of the background. It will take years to change the slums. But the immediacy of the problem requires a strong, continuing beginning. We are all involved.

Farm Bureau Head Says He Suffers for Inflation Policy

ITHACA, N. Y., April 13 (AP) — Charles B. Shuman, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, said tonight that the Johnson Administration was making the farmer a whipping boy for inflation generated by the Government's own spending policies.

The farm official contended that the producer was getting "the double whammy" from the Administration in the form of legislative recommendations to force farmers to pay higher wages and in administrative actions designed to decrease the prices of farm products.

In a speech prepared for a Cornell University forum, Mr. Shuman said:

"President Johnson knows as well as nearly every taxpayer that his irresponsible spending, which exceeds anything in the history of this country, is the real force driving up prices and deflating the value of the dollar.

"And now that the Administration publicly admits that inflation is here, it is seeking the Administration publicly admits that inflation is here, the scapegoat to divert public attention from the real culprit."

Special Impact Noted

Mr. Shuman said farmers were paying a higher price for inflation than any other group. He said their production costs had increased from $26.2-billion in 1960 to $30.3-billion in 1965.

He listed the following Administration actions designed to depress farm prices:

¶Curtailment of military purchases of pork.

¶Increased imports of cheese.

¶Imposition of tight quotas on exports of hides, mainly cattle hides.

¶Forecasts by Secretary of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman that farm prices would drop 6 to 10 per cent this year.

Mr. Shuman said the economic picture for farmers was much worse than farm income figures indicated.

While realized net farm income—the amount left after deduction of production costs—went from $11.7-billion in 1960 to $14.1-billion in 1965, he said, nearly $2.5-billion of the 1965 income came from Government subsidies and not from the marketplace.

Reuther Asks for More Poverty Funds

By NAN ROBERTSON

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 13 — Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Automobile workers, said today that President Johnson had made a "mistake" in not asking Congress for more money for the poverty program.

Mr. Reuther said that the President had asked for what he thought was politically palatable rather than "what he believes is necessary."

"It's a mistake to trim your sails before the fight," he declared.

He warned that unless bold action was taken, the bitter, frustrated poor would begin to "search for answers in the blindness of night, and reason will yield to riots and brotherhood will yield to bloodshed and we will tear asunder the fabric of our society."

Mr. Reuther made his remarks at the opening of a "Poor People's Poverty Convention" sponsored by the new Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, a broadly based coalition of which he is president.

"There are people over on Capitol Hill who would like to water down and deny appropriations we need for the poverty program, using the situation in Southeast Asia as an excuse," he said.

$1.75-Billion Asked

President Johnson has asked for $1.75-billion for the program in the fiscal year beginning July 1. It is $250-million more than last year, but the money will be spread among many more communities.

Mr. Reuther talker of "making appropriations with an eyedropper" and said the Citizens Crusade should "mobilize a counter-thrust" to "stiffen the political backbones in Washington and get the kind of legislative decisions we need."

The meeting of nearly 1,000, some from impoverished sections of the country, included militant civil rights and civic action leaders, liberal clergy and philanthropists "the broadest coalition of concerned citizens ever gathered in the national capital."

Walter P. Reuther addresses the session in Washington.

He said that without the participation of many at the convention today, none of the recent civil rights legislation "would have been written."

Vice President Humphrey, who repeated many of Mr. Reuther's sentiments in a luncheon speech, said that "the war on poverty leaves no room for conscientious objectors. Everybody must participate."

The mood of the convention today was mutinous. Delegates from Harlem, the Mississippi Delta, Appalachia and the Wtts district of Los Angeles expressed outrage at how little was being done to help them, particularly by the Office of Economis Opportunity, which runs the national poverty program.

"O.E.O. ought to be ashamed of itself and the Federal Government ought to be ashamed of itself," declared Mrs. Unita Blackwell, an official of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party. "If you don't help us catch up we are going to run off and leave you."

Tired of Speeches

Mrs. Blackwell said she was "tired of beautiful speeches." She charged that "hand-picked people" of white boards of supervisors, plantation owners and police chiefs were running the local poverty programs in Mississippi. "They're going to see me about my poverty," she said scornfully. "They kept me in poverty."

"We is the people, we is the poor people, we is the people you is supposed to help. The same men who pay us $3 a day and are bent in putting people off the land—that's the men who are on the poverty committee," she declared.

"You just come up with the resources, and we'll show you what we can do with the money," Mrs. Blackwell said.

In a workshop earlier, the audience shouted approval when the efforts of poverty office to involve the poor in local programs to help htemselves was described as "a failure so far."

Flag Desecration Bill

WASHINGTON, April 13 (AP) —The Senate Republican leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, introduced today a bill to make it a Federal offense to desecrate the American flag. He said there had been many instances of desecration of the flag recently and he had been surprised to learn there was no Federal law on the subject, only state statutes.

Winning Poverty War, Regional Chief Declares

AC 4/28/66

By ACHSAH NESMITH

"We're winning the war on poverty," Frank K. Sloan, Southeastern regional director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, told a press seminar here Wednesday.

"Like the war in Viet Nam, it won't be over tomorrow," he said. But he added that he felt the progress made had not been adequately reported by the press because so much of the nation's press had predicted its failure before the program got started.

"Many have a vested interest in being able to say it has not succeeded," Sloan said.

On the Job Corps, which the OEC acknowledges has been the most criticized of its activities, Sloan said the number of incidents of trouble between Job Corpsmen and authorities "is substantially less than at the average military installation," according to military and FBI reports.

CLOSE TO AVERAGE

"It's very close to the average of colleges in your local communities," he said, "and we take youngsters from the most grinding poverty, with less than nothing. They were already problems or they wouldn't be there."

Sloan said the war on poverty won't be won by the $1.75 billion a year or the workers contributed by the Office of Economic Opportunity, however. "It will be won by the genius of the idea.

"The people of this country have fought the problems of poverty, disease and ignorance down through the years since 1776," he said. "What couldn't be done with $40 billion (contributed by all public and private charities last year) and hundreds of thousands of dedicated volunteers can't be done by adding $1.75 billion more and putting a few hundred more dedicated people in the field."

CHANGE FOR POOR

But the change from doing things for the poor—giving him baskets of food or immunization shots or whatever—to doing things with the poor, is the genius of the program, Sloan said.

"The change in prepositions is the most important change in social welfare in the history of this country," he declared.

He stressed the importance not only of involving the poor in the solutions to their problems, but of involving the power structure of each community at every stage. "It's a hometown fight. You can't win unless the community is behind it."

"If we didn't get the message before, we got it from Watts, California," Sloan declared, "that America's lowest are not going to watch the fortunate three-fourths pull their motor boats up to Lake Lanier behind our new cars while their children sleep on the floor and starve."

Job Corps regional director Dr. Joseph Hart told an earlier meeting that less than 2 per cent of all Job Corpsmen had been involved in any incidents since its beginning.

He said 90 per cent of his recruits had medical and/or dental problems, 66 per cent were military rejects, and 70 per cent were on welfare or from welfare families at the time they joined.

"There have been some fantastic reports of the costs of training," he said. "But remember these youngsters have been losers for up to 20 years, and very little has been invested in them previously, while middle income youngsters' parents have been investing $1,000 or more a year in their improvement."

"The dropout rate (for Job Corps) is high, but only about half the dropout rate typical of college freshmen," he asserted.

Counting all the costs of facilities and buildings, he said, the 24-hour a day, seven-day a week program costs between $4,500 and $6,500 a year per trainee, but this relative cost goes down the longer each center is in operation.

"If you figured the costs of high school education that way it would seem prohibitive," he observed, noting that most people compare it with the tuition cost of colleges, without considering the costs of buildings and the substantial private and government subsidies provided colleges.

"If only 5 per cent get jobs and lead productive lives they will pay for the program," he said. Currently, 90 per cent of the "graduates" of Job Corps are holding jobs, he said.

Dr. Hart said 800 youngsters have completed their training at various levels and currently 24,000 more are in training.

What Is Poverty? It's A Lot of Problems

By ACHSAH NESMITH

"Poverty isn't just lacks—it's a tradition," Duane Beck, executive director of the Community Council of the Atlanta Area, feels.

That's why, as most Americans have come to realize, just filling particular lacks, like not enough food or medicine, or enough money at a given time, will not solve the problem of poverty.

"Poverty is a whole bunch of problems," he adds, involving housing, education, health, motivation, all of them affected by and affecting the tradition from which the individual and the family came.

CALLED A CYCLE

The whole bundle is called the cycle of poverty. The ultimate solution will affect what the society as a whole is and does in a number of other areas — courts, transportation, consumer sales patterns, recreation, even taxes.

As a society and as a city, the social planner from Pigeon, Mich., feels, "We're not very smart yet. We haven't accurately described the problems, related them to other problems. We've never really applied the thought process to social problem solving. We've simply reacted to situations—a hungry child by feeding it, a sick one by treating it. We're only beginning to look at the reasons why he's hungry and sick."

MATCHING SOLUTION

He sees the function of his organization as "compiling as much information as we need to match the solution to the problem. Not as much information as it's possible to find out, but as much as we need."

The council investigates, interviews, studies censuses and other figures and tries to describe the problem.

Then it tries to think up all the possible solutions "without getting cluttered up with how it's being done and your own biases."

At this point, and ideally only at this point, do they weigh the feasibility of any solution.

This means considering community attitudes, possibilities of financing, the relation to existing agencies and their functions. But it goes beyond even those.

"Any planning we do has to include thinking not just about programs but the climate that gives the individual security in that setting, the opportunity to practice" whatever the program is designed to give him.

In concrete terms, that means you can't just teach a person a trade.

WHAT IT MEANS

It means you look at whether a young mother, if taught a new skill so she can get a job, will have any place to leave her children. It means you consider how to instill in people the motivation to do a job if you train them, to learn what you offer to each them, to keep a cleaner house if you build it.

Going deeper, it means you look at the most basic causes and try to get at them.

This means instead of just attacking slow learners from poverty areas as educational problems, the health problems that contribute to their apathy must be attacked.

This may mean not only medical care for children, but prenatal care for mothers, and seeing that potential mothers get adequate nutrition and medical attention so that before the time comes they will be physically capable of producing healthy mentally competent children.

Thus, as Beck sees it, programs of pre-natal care at Grady Hospital area basic solution. A family has hope of having time and finances to provide for their children's needs.

In time it should cut down on the percentage on mentally retarded and physially handicapped children who need special training. It should give mothers more adequate knowledge of caring for their children and themselves so that the next generation has fewer of the health problems that made many of their parents unemployable at 40.

That's breaking the "cycle of poverty," but it involves other things — things like the motivation of a young boy whose father and grandfather never supported their families, whose mother and grandmother accepted this, who lives in a neighborhood where two-thirds of the families or more are like this.

"They need models. One of the problems in our society is creating heroes," Beck feels. This is especially true of the Negro poor. "It may be better for the white — a white boy can find a white banker."

"Inadequacy is never just in the individual — it's in the systems, too," Beck explains. "The systems do much to relieve inadequacy — through education, health and welfare programs, scholarships and other incentives. But sometimes we have to modify the systems, or create new ones."

What is the city's area of greatest need?

"The development of children because it can solve so many of the future's adult problems."

What is the biggest problem of the moment?

"Housing. We don't have any one group thinking creatively about how to better house our community in all areas—private, public, non-profit—including zoning, taxation and all. There are a lot of theories but nobody in the community has handled it all. We need experimental research programs with a premium on new and better ideas, not just low income but all housing."

City's Needs Highlighted

Two reports by the Community Council, one written in February, the other completed this month, point up many areas of Atlanta's needs.

The first, an interim report on Social Blight and Its Causes is one of four scheduled reports designed to help urban renewal deal with the social problems that cause and exist in physical blight.

It highlights several things known in a general way but not quite admitted by most Atlantans:

That city services — street repair, lights, garbage collection, sewers, street cleaning — often completely pass over slum areas, and housing codes are enforced least where enforcement is most needed.

That having to take a day off when they can't earn a living wage working every day often means the poor don't take advantage of free services, particularly preventive health services, that could reduce many more serious problems in the long haul. Transportation problems also cut off many from free services.

NON-ATTENDANCE

A high percentage of slum children rarely, if ever, attend school despite compulsory attendance laws. Reasons include caring for still younger children, lack of clothes and lunch money, parental indifference, poor preparation that makes them behind from the first day.

Average incomes of most mother-supported families and many two-parent families could not provide adequate food and shelter under administration by an expert. Lack of time, transportation and knowledge and the fact that the poor almost always pay more and get less multiply the problems when usually the mothers themselves were born with health problems.

"Backgrounds for Decision Making," just completed, was designed as a guide to budget committees of what now exists in the health and service fields in Atlanta.

It contains suggestions for expansion, filling gaps and where totally new services are needed. Though it is not a depth study or anything like one, it contains some useful discoveries.

There are no facilities or agencies in Atlanta currently treating drug addiction. The problem is handled as a criminal one except that addicts who cannot afford private treatment are referred to the federal installation at Lexington, Ky.

"Backgrounds" recommends first that it be determined why this is so, and if programs for addicts seem practical, that they be designed to avoid duplication of effort or wide gaps in services.

The Council found a duplication of some services for alcoholics while others were totally absent. They recommended adding treatment of alcoholics in hospitals under the diagnosis of their addictions, development of partial hospitalization, allowing the alcoholic to work during the day but live under supervised conditions at night, more emergency clinics for alcoholics and addicts in acute phases.

AND THE RETARDED

Trainable mentally retarded children have received little attention in this area. More training opportunities as well as day care facilities geared to their special needs, perhaps in family day care situations with small groups, were suggested, along with more help for parents facing and coping with the problem.

In the nursing home field, the council found a great need for beds for terminal cancer patients, as well as a general expansion of non-profit homes charging medium rates to meet Medicare's demands.

Because of Medicare, as well as half a dozen other areas of health needs remaining unmet, the Council suggests a significant increase in the size of the Visiting Nurse Association Staff, which now numbers only 23.

Daycare facilities, both for very young children and for older children during after-school hours, could be a key to narrowing the educational and health gaps for youngsters in poverty areas, as well as providing supervision that could cut crime rates later, stimulate motivation that could break the poverty cycle and free mothers who must work.

In addition, the Council found a serious need for expanded dental services to the poor.

Crippled children suffering from certain diseases are currently not eligible for treatment at existing centers.

Some means of coordinating the various services for rehabilitating physically handicapped children and adults is "badly needed."

Council Shaping Atlanta's Future By Coordinating Social Services

After Only 6 Years, Council's Work Is Much in Evidence

For a six-year-old, it's done a lot.

The Community Council of the Atlanta Area Inc., one of the lesser known shapers of Atlanta's future, works through suggestion and research. It has no official power and anything it decides should be done has to be done by somebody else. It plans without power to carry out, the oldest known way to disappear without making the slightest mark.

"We sit around and think," executive director Duane Beck says of his operation.

But six years after its creation the results of the council's thoughts are all about us, not always as the council envisioned them, but recognizable.

The council designed the basic program and structure of Economic Opportunity Atlanta. The West End Project, on which the neighborhood centers were based, was a council demonstration project long before President Lyndon B. Johnson was even in office.

The project represented a new approach to some old social problems in Atlanta. Recognizing the fact that many of the health and welfare agencies in Atlanta had the same customers, and many of these people were still not getting help with the basic causes of their problems, the project tried for the first time to offer all the needed services from one location near where the people lived. It attempted to treat the multi-problem family or individual as a whole, instead of a health problem, a welfare case, a job seeker.

This involved not only cooperation of services from many sources, both public and private, but also going to the people rather than waiting for them to come to the service.

But the war on poverty is only part of the work of the Community Council.

After an initial inventory of hospital and health services in the metropolitan area, which brought out particularly the need for psychiatric beds and the shortage of trained people in all the paramedical fields, the council has set up a Hospital and Health Planning department with a federal matching grant.

Finding recruits and additional training opportunities to meet the current and future needs in the health services has been a major interest from the beginning.

Originally financed by the United Appeal and foundation grants, usually for specific studies and projects, the council still does many of its studies on contract, but is developing a basic budget base from the Appeal and local governmental and private sources of funds. This will allow greater local determination of projects, the board feels, and more continuity.

'Poverty Is a Tradition'—Discouragement and Habits Go Back Generations

The Poor, Unable to Buy in Volume, Found to Pay High Prices for Food

By WILLIAM M. BLAIR
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 11—The poor pay more for food than consumers in higher income areas, the Government reported today.

The reason, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said, is not that the poor are charged more but that they tend to buy in smaller quantities, which cost more per unit: They often cannot take advantage of the economy of buying in larger amounts.

The report also said that quality and service tended to be better in stores in higher-income areas.

The bureau found in one example that a small independent food store in a low-income neighborhood sold flour in two-pound sacks preferred by local families while five-pound sacks were the most popular in higher-income-area chain and large independent stores.

Price Differential Found

It found that the price for flour ranged from 14 per cent a pound higher in New York to 35 per cent higher in Chicago when purchased in two-pound sacks rather than five-pound sacks. Yet, the price for a five-pound sack in chain stores in low-income neighborhoods was nearly the same as in the higher-income areas.

Sugar sold in two-pound packages, the bureau said, ranges from 13 per cent higher in Atlanta to 39 per cent higher in Chicago than in five-pound packages. Milk in quart containers, the size favored in poor areas, ranges 1 per cent higher in Atlanta to 23 per cent higher in Washington over a half-gallon container.

"No significant differences" exist in prices charged by food stores in low-income areas as against prices charged in higher-income areas even when the same types of stores, same qualities and quantities of foods and the same types of packages are compared, the bureau said.

Small Stores Charge More

"Prices usually are higher, however, in the small independent stores which are most common in the low-income neighborhoods than in the larger independents and chain stores which predominate in the higher-income areas," the bureau declared.

The bureau, which made the study for the National Commission on Food Marketing in six metropolitan areas, found that in New York and Houston small independents charged slightly less for 18 identical food items used in the survey.

Food products that cost $10 in New York chain stores situated in a higher-income area cost 35 cents less in small independents in a low-income area. The same products cost $11.50 in a large independent store.

In Houston, the same $10 chain-store food basket costs $9.37 in small independents but $11 in the large independents.

In Atlanta, however, the $10 worth of items from the higher-income area chain costs $11.50 in the small independents and $11 at the large independent. In Chicago, the small independent collects $10.20 and the large independent $9.50. In Washington, the small independent charges $10 and the large independent got $10.50. In Los Angeles, the $10 cost is the same for all three types of stores.

Subject of Controversy

The foods were of the same quantity and quality used by the bureau in its monthly Consumer Price Index. In some cases they used identical brands.

The study was made Feb. 21-25. It covered 30 stores in each city, 15 each in low-income and high-income neighborhoods.

The question whether the poor pay more for food has arisen frequently recently. It came before the National Commission on Food Marketing during its two-year study of food marketing that ranged from farms to retail stores. The issue also prompted allegations that chain stores avoided low-income areas, leaving low-income families to the mercy of higher prices.

Against Compulsory Law

Arnold E. Chase, Assistant Commissioner for Prices and Living Conditions of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, said in a briefing on the study that the bureau did not direct itself to the question of why chains generally stayed out of low-income areas.

Dr. George L. Brandow, executive director of the food commission, said that "when chain stores consider expansion opportunities for larger profits they find them in urban areas."

"When the poor congregate in slums the market is higher," he declared.

Dr. Brandow said there was no reason for the commission to recommend legislation to Congress to force chain stores into low-income areas. He observed, however, that chains might "tailor stores to fit the needs of a community."

Dr. Brandow noted that one chain in Detroit operated stores in lower-income areas under a different name from its usual company name. He said chains might stock these stores with products that sell at "substantial discounts."

Representative Benjamin S. Rosenthal, Democrat of Queens, who is a member of the food commission, said today that he was seeking a way to induce chain stores to enter low-income areas with volume purchasing and lower prices to meet the needs of the poor.

He said that he had been considering a bill that would call for some kind of subsidy, tax incentive or low-interest loans to chains. He pointed out, however, that this might speed mergers and permit domination of markets.

At the same time, he said, Government aid to "Mom and Pop" stores in poor neighborhoods might "subsidize inefficiency."

The commission, authorized by Congress two years ago, has completed its report, which is scheduled to be made public July 1. It reportedly will call for tighter reins on mergers of big food companies to prevent the "concentration of purchasing power" that weakens competition.

This concentration is not yet high enough to impair competition, it was learned, the report says, but it cautions that the Government should set up better safeguards through the Federal Trade Commission and other regulatory agencies. More consumer protection is proposed through compulsory grades in all food products and standardization of packaged products.

The report also calls for more aid to farmers, including the creation of agricultural marketing boards to strengthen producers' bargaining position as their food products enter the market.

For Promotion of Chains

The report was adopted by a 9-to-6 vote recently. Three minority members will publish separate views. Separate dissenting statements are also expected from the other three minority members.

Mrs. Esther Peterson, Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs, said in a statement on the Bureau of Labor Statistics study that positive steps by the Government to promote expansion of supermarkets into high-density city neighborhoods merited consideration.

Dr. Clark Sees Threat to Negro's Sense of Dignity in Moynihan Proposal

12/14/66

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13—A former Administration official now in academic life told the Senate today that a key element of any program to upgrade the lives of Negroes in ghettos should be some form of guaranteed minimum family income.

Shortly afterward, in the same forum, a prominent Negro psychologist asked whether this could be done without grave risk to a Negro's sense of dignity, worth and self-esteem.

The two men who engaged in this discussion were Daniel Patrick Moynihan, a high Labor Department official in Kennedy Administration, now director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Kenneth B. Clark, a New York psychologist.

Both appeared before a Senate Government Operations subcommittee, which is nearing the end of a long investigation into the causes of and possible cures for the problems of American cities.

The areas of agreement between the two were large. They agreed that the slum problem was essentially a problem of the urban Negro and that most existing Government programs were of marginal utility in improving the condition of the ghetto.

Moreover, while neither appeared willing to abandon his own personal vision of a multiracial society, both acknowledged that widespread desegregation was many years away.

"It just isn't going to happen in this generation," Mr. Moynihan declared.

Mr. Clark did not dissent.

However, they disagreed sharply over the appropriate remedies for helping the Negro in what they agreed was, and would continue to be, a fundamentally biracial society.

Mr. Moynihan's basic case was that one of the main causes of instability and despair in the ghetto is the breakdown of the Negro family, a subject on which he wrote a controversial report last year. The report found, among other things, that many Negro men left home when they could not find jobs, in order to make their families eligible for welfare assistance.

To arrest this deterioration, Mr. Moynihan suggested today a dual attack involving "guaranteed employment for men" and a "regular program of income maintenance." The two must be joined, he argued, because "even full employment will no longer produce a family income in the United States at a level necessary to maintain social stability in the slums."

Calls $80 Pay Inadequate

"You can't raise a family in New York on $80 a week," he said.

Mr. Moynihan said he would have much preferred to see the last Congress enact these two ideas into law rather than the hundreds of measures it did pass. He said there were few Government programs now on the books that appeared to be encouraging improvements in the "social fabric" of slum life or the Negro family.

At one point the sociologist startled the subcommittee by disputing the popular notion that ghetto life can be significantly improved through heavy financing of education.

"Pouring money into slum schools makes very little difference," he said.

He suggested that no matter how good the schools were they could not always reach the product of a broken home and an environment in which few of the males find work.

"Education," he said, "is not something that principally takes place in schools."

In his testimony this afternoon, Dr. Clark applauded the Moyniham Report's illumination of the "relationship between male desertion and employment."

But he told newsmen later the schools remained key points of "leverage" in the slums. And he told the committee that "ghetto schools must become models of educational excellence" even if society has to make a disproportionate effort to do it.

Moreover, he told reporters afterward that "we can't use the pathology of the slums as an excuse for the underachievement of Negro children in the schools."

"We have to look at what goes on in the classrooms, and when you do that you must conclude that the schools are poor and unresponsive," he said.

Dr. Clark did not totally reject the Moynihan idea of some kind of guaranteed family allowance. In fact, he told the committee that "the possibility for dignity simply does not exist" in an environment of "stark material deprivation."

However, he said some way must be found to channel funds to Negro families to avoid the "dehumanizing" impact that, he said, the present system of welfare payments has on its beneficiaries.

Unless such a system is found, he added, even an immediate payment of $5,000 to slum families "would not affect one iota the observable pathology of the slums."

AGENDA ITEM I --- SOCIAL CHANGE AND CRIMINALITY
RAPPORTEUR: Mr. Marshall Clinard

1. During the course of the discussion, participants sought to determine whether and in which ways certain changes in a society may affect the incidence of delinquency and criminality. The discussion also turned on whether the legal system adequately reflected social change in the sense of change in the institutional structure and behavioural patterns of a society or nation. It was observed that all countries undergo change, but that the contemporary world appeared to be particularly characterized by rapid and important changes. Some changes may be imperceptible over short periods, and rates of change may differ from one society to another, and within a society certain institutional patterns may be more stable than others.

2. Changes in social institutions occur in all societies, and it is erroneous to assume that changes are associated primarily with developing countries; in fact, there are indications that some types of social change may be even more rapid in the developed countries. Likewise, it was recalled that many so-called developed countries are in some geographic areas as likely to be as underdeveloped as countries labeled as less-developed.

3. It was agreed that economic explanations of crime are not fully satisfactory in all countries. While developing countries are likely to attribute their crime and delinquency rates exclusively to poverty and unemployment, and while certain developed countries are likely to attribute some of their crime to poverty in slum areas, the incidence of crime and delinquency appears to be extensive in countries which are economically highly developed. Such a situation is confusing and in a sense discouraging to developing countries. It appears that in both highly industrialized and developing countries the answers may well lie primarily in factors other than economic, namely, in urbanization, in new values and norms and in changes in social control.

4. While there was some dissent, the consensus was that the factors in causes of delinquency and crime must be sought not so much in the individual or in his family as in the broader social and political changes taking place in his environment. Consequently, in formulating measures of social defence this approach must be taken into consideration.

5. It was pointed out that, in Japan, for example, where industrial development and the standard of living has rapidly risen, there has been a considerable increase in youth crime since the Second WorldWar. The spread of ideas of freedom and equality and the interpretation of these ideas by young people resulted in many of them becoming preoccupied with the desire to have more and more consumer goods and pleasures. Many of them appear to have almost unlimited desires for such possessions. In this context it is not poverty that lies behind criminality, but desire for the multi-variety of consumer items available and for enjoying life.

6. Laws do not always keep up with the social changes occuring in a society, with the result that crimes occur and criminals are made by laws sociologically no longer acceptable to the society. Evidence was cited, for example, of sex laws in many countries which appear no longer to be in accord with the sentiments and attitudes of the people as a whole. Another example is the existence of laws making drunkenness a criminal offence and some efforts are now being made in several countries to change such laws. It is often assumed that laws are supported by the people, and this may not necessarily be the case. Research should therefore be conducted on the changing moral judgments of the population. In some cases, however, new criminal laws have reflected changes in and affirmation of fundamental new values, as in the case of newer legislation in some countries eliminating racial discrimination or guaranteeing equality of women.

7. It was observed that there is in most countries an increasing recourse to social control through law to replace the decline in family, religious, tribal, village and caste controls. There was general agreement that, in the enactment of new laws in both developed and developing countries, caution should be exercised in the exclusive employment of the criminal sanction, since this tends to designate as criminals persons who might not otherwise be so considered. In place of strict legal measures, efforts should be made to deal with new forms of deviant behavior by the use of other types of sanctions. It is also possible to eliminate certain categories of criminal offenders, such as alcoholics or certain motor vehicle violators, by the use of other measures.

8. Nearly all countries reported an increase in crime and delinquency which presumably reflects social changes in the society affecting the violation of legal norms. Some participants from countries with centrally planned economies reported that delinquency and criminality had decreased during recent years. This was attributed to changes in the social system primarily through the elimination of unemployment, increase in literacy, provision of more cultural and recreational activities and strengthening youth morale, as well as through enlisting the support of the average person in the condemnation of deviant behaviour. The substitution of non-criminal sanctions in place of penal measures for certain offences was also said to have contributed to this reduction.

9. Criminal statistics, which measure assumed increase in delinquency and criminality, as well as comparisons between the statistics in different countries, should be utilized with great caution. An increase in delinquency or youth crime for example, may reflect population growth in the younger age categories and improved reporting measures, as well as the availability of more police and judicial facilities which may result in the processing of more persons and the stricter enforcement of some laws. At certain times there may also be less tolerance by the public of certain offences, thus putting pressure on governmental authorities to enforce the laws by making more arrests. An increase may also reflect the transfer of social control from the family and other institutions to the legal measures of the political state, even though the same number of offences had previously occured. New laws, or the greater use of existing laws due to changes in the society, may also tend to increase the incidence of delinquency and criminality. Greatly increased use of motor vehicles may add to the total amount of delinquency and criminality. Likewise, the more rigorous enforcement of laws dealing with liquor violations among youths will inflate delinquency figures. Increased delinquency and crime may reflect more general public concern, and consequently a tendency for the police to apprehend more persons in certain age groups or for certain offences.

10. In making comparative appraisals of crime and delinquency in various countries, extreme caution must be exercised because of the differences in the reliability of the statistics, the degree to which statistical data are generally available, the degree of enforcement of laws, and whether or not the laws are identical or comparable. When comparing developing countries with the more developed, for example, the comparative absence of motor vehicles and knowledge of how to operate them in the developing countries makes for less offences of this type and may make it difficult to compare accurately the incidence of delinquency and crime in the two types of countries.

11. Usually statistics on delinquency and crime are presented for the whole country, and judgments of increase or decrease are based on such figures to show the effect of social change. This is highly misleading, for there may actually be great variations within a given country. The figures for a given country may also reflect the degree of urbanization and cases where no distinction is made between criminality in urban and rural areas.

12. It is likely that, as a society becomes more complex in its social organization and industrial development, more legislation will be needed. Consequently, the incidence of crimes may be expected to increase. In this regard, developing countries are faced with special problems as they progress toward a more highly industrialized stage. Violations of commercial and industrial regulations may be cited as examples. For instance, countries may enact compulsory health insurance which, in turn, may produce cases of fraud which did not previously arise; increased regulation of motor vehicles or new forms of taxation may likewise increase criminality.

13. The view that crime is associated with urbanization was repeatedly expressed in the discussion, and one contention was that a higher rate of criminality existed in large urban areas, that crime increased by city size and that criminality was related to the changing social structure presented to rural migrants moving to urban areas. On the other hand, it was contended that in some situations urbanization had not been associated with criminality.

14. While there were differences in the other aspects of crime in developed and developing countries, they appear to have one thing in common, namely, that urbanization is associated with increased delinquency and crime. Urbanization appears to afford an opportunity for greater impersonality. It gives rise, inter alia, to different social values, some of which are conducive to criminality and delinquency; to greater freedom of action, more temptations for violations of law, and a general decline in social controls exerted through the family, such as family reputation, as well as tribal, village, caste, or other associations; and to a breakdown in communication between age groups due to the absence of the family members from home and different occupations and education of the younger and older members. Urbanization may introduce new norms, result in new forms of social control and necessitate changes in the legal system and even in measures of correctional treatment. It is impossible to reverse this on-rushing tide of urbanization, and its role must therefore be accepted and measures devised to cope with it.

15. The effect of urbanization appears to be particularly pronounced among youths. It is largely for this reason that almost throughout the world criminals are young urban persons. Most delinquency and crime occurs among those under the age of twenty. Several participants mentioned that the growth of cities often resulted in a largely separate youth culture, separated from adult controls and with its own norms and standards which can readily lead to forms of delinquency and crime as accepted forms of recreation, excitement or ways of obtaining material goods. Youth in most countries tends to be isolated from the general society. Several countries reported that youth tends to be in conflict with the norms of the general society.

16. There are some indications that the motivations for youth crime may be somewhat different in the developed and less developed countries. In the more developed countries, the behavior may be a product of affluence, of youth lacking a challenge under urban conditions, and relatively little pressure on them to work. Long years of schooling may increasingly separate youths from adults and from playing an important substantive role in society. In the slums of affluent societies, the impact of a separate youth culture may have serious consequences. On the other hand, in the less developed and developing countries the impact of urban life on village migrants, detribalization and loss of other ties, and the impact of a widespread slum way of life with its often deviant norms and standards on migrants may have great effect upon youth criminality.

17. Another factor contributing particularly to youth crime is the tendency toward greater individualization in many contemporary societies. In addition to urbanization, industrialization and decline of social controls, there is also increasing emphasis today upon individual freedom of action. Democratic values, particularly as they are taught in the schools, the emphasis upon the individual and his need for freedom of action, the frequently expressed desire to free the individual from traditional controls may have great consequences upon the behavior of youths. As one speaker said, it may be that delinquency and crime might indeed be part of the price which had to be paid for freeing the individual all over the world which sometimes led to his rebellion against existing forms of society. It was, therefore, essential that special emphasis should be laid on the improvement of social institutions with a view to seeking to teach young people the responsible use of freedom.

18. The correlation between youth and criminality presents great potential problems for developing countries. There is a higher proportion of individuals under the age of twenty than in many developed countries, and in some developing countries the percentage of persons in this age group may run as high as fifty per cent. Moreover, it was pointed out that, in some countries, as in Africa, the population of the cities consists primarily of younger persons; rather than speaking of a youth sub-culture, one could therefore well characterize such cities as consisting of a dominant youth culture with the older population a minority. The preponderance of youths in the cities of many developing countries presents a particularly dangerous situation as disruptive values are introduced and as technological changes, such as the presence of motor vehicles, increase..

19. It was generally recognized that the decline in family controls, due to changes such as urbanization, has had considerable consequences on the development of delinquency and crime. At the same time, it was generally agreed that the traditional role of the family would be difficult to reinstate fully under urban conditions. A number of participants stressed the need to find means of strengthening the family as much as possible in an urban setting. This was considered particularly important in the case of migrant families to the city. Governments should emphasize the importance of the family and give social assistance to strengthening it whenever possible. In this connection, the need to devise methods of helping families to adjust to difficult urban conditions was recognized.

20. Because of rapid changes in contemporary society and of increased education and literacy, there are increasing conflicts between youths and adults particularly in urban areas of developing countries. Under urban conditions there is often a decline in the concept of family honour and families--rather than supporting punishment by legal authorities--often try to see that the authorities do not take action, even though the families themselves have not done so.

21. A number of participants stressed the importance of involving the public in efforts to cope with problems produced by social change: there was need to involve more ordinary persons rather than relying exclusively on governmental agencies and legal processes in coping with problems presented by social change. Particularly in urban areas, the control of delinquency and crime should also be considered as part of the responsibility of the ordinary citizen. This might involve more efforts at the local community level, responsibility for dealing with crime being assumed by smaller administrative units, and there should be greater involvement of persons in groups representing potential risks for delinquency and crime, such as lower class persons and particularly urban youths. In fact, an experimental program in Puerto Rico was described which involved the return of recovered young, urban drug addicts to their local communities to help deal with problems of drug addiction. It was suggested that this method may offer similar possibilities for the employment of former delinquents and criminals in helping to change the attitudes of their local communities.

22. Despite pronounced changes in the general society, most developing countries have not introduced sufficient changes in their programs to deal with delinquency and crime. It was pointed out, however, that new nations should be extremely selective in their choice of measures to deal with delinquency and crime. Changes in the understanding of the nature of delinquency and crime as well as differences in their own problems and available resources mean that the application of methods used in other parts of the world may be unsuitable.

23. The expansion of education facilities may in itself be unsuccessful in dealing with deviant behaviour of youth; there is need for more specific education on the values of society, in problems of social relationships and in the understanding of national objectives and values.

24. It was suggested that there needs to be extensive research on the relation between the dynamics of social change and criminality. Changes in values do not necessarily lead to criminality. It is necessary to demonstrate in what specific way change affects delinquent and criminal behaviour. Many existing studies of criminal behaviour, dealing as they do with a past situation, may be no longer valid or applicable because of changes subsequently taking place in a society. There is need for more studies of contemporary social change and of the relation existing between social change and criminality. Such studies and predictions of future trends might do much to develop a more effective and realistic prevention and treatment programme.

25. Delinquency and crime appears to occur in varying degrees and in different forms in countries with differing political structures, varying stages of economic development, and different types of economic systems. Several participants urged that there should be more coordinated comparative studies of the relation between social change and delinquency and crime. One system suggested that such studies might well be longitudinal research on groups of children and adolescents which could be followed up over a period of time to determine the effects of social change in the society. Research on social change, however, is complicated by difficulties in devising adequate quantitative indices, for measuring, for example, such factors as "decline in family controls" or the presence of "individualistic values." It was felt by several persons that the United Nations should undertake such a coordinated comparative research programme and expand its research studies in this field.

AGENDA ITEM II - SOCIAL FORCES AND THE PREVENTION OF CRIMINALITY
(with particular reference to the public, the family, educational facilities and occupational opportunities)

RAPPORTEUR: Dr. T. Asuni

1. Social forces, in one way or another, have some bearing on the control of juvenile delinquency and adult criminality. Among these forces are public opinion, religion, education, urbanization, migration from rural to urban areas and industrialization. It was observed that although these social forces may not in themselves be regarded as either preventive of or conducive to crime, they are capable of engendering certain collective attitudes towards fundamental social value or direction, as a consequence of rapid social, economic and political changes. Hence, if social defence preventive programs are to achieve any measure of success, they must recognize these essential factors and the attitudes which they engender.

2. The nature of public participation in crime preventive measures would depend, among other factors, on the political or economic systems of the countries concerned. In communities where the people exert a large measure of influence on the exercise of public authority, there is greater concordance between legislation and the administration of justice, on the one hand, and the general sense of justice and morality on the other. No matter how well organized and advanced the police, judiciary and penal institutions are, their efforts will not achieve optimum results without the participation and collaboration of the public.

3. Various speakers described different forms of participation by the public in crime prevention. In some countries, peoples' volunteer militia units, whose task it is to preserve law and order, have been constituted. The participation of schoolchildren in the control of traffic is another example. The public could also participate in adjudication and the administration of justice. Comradeship courts, for instance, have been established in some countries to function in specific occupational settings and to deal with various forms of misdemeanour. Thus drunken drivers are tried in clubs for drivers, in the expectation that this will have a deterrent effect on other drivers. In one country more than a quarter of all cases are dealt with in this way, through comradeship courts.

4. In most countries the public, in one form or another, also participates in the rehabilitation of offenders. Private citizens help to carry out educational work in penal institutions in order to raise the level of technical training for detainees. They also assist in placing discharged prisoners and ex-inmates of delinquency institutions in employment and may act as voluntary after-care agents.

5. The participation of the public can also be seen in such experiments as an urban police program in California, where a Community Relations Division has been set up in order to establish close liaison with the public. Discussion groups have been organized with teachers, clergymen, businessmen and others taking part, and police officers give talks to schoolchildren on good citizenship. The police arrange sports meetings for children, especially in less privileged sectors of the city. They also employ voluntary police officers. These measures are calculated to make the police appear less threatening, authoritarian and remote.

6. Youth organizations established and run by voluntary agencies, where some educational program is followed, were also cited as a means of reducing criminality.

7. A note of warning was struck about the danger of the public taking the law into their own hands and misusing it; this danger calls for education in true citizenship, and for objectivity on the part of the public.

8. An example was cited from a country where, to facilitate the participation and cooperation of the public, the program for delinquency is decentralized. The State's role is mainly one of guidance and coordination. Arrangements are made with private institutions for the treatment of juveniles, and charitable organizations are closely involved in social services.

9. Educating the public so as to secure maximum cooperation in preventive programs is a necessity. Adult education and the elimination of illiteracy could be used to re-awaken family responsibility and improve the training of law officers, as well as to increase public participation in the prevention of crime.

10. It was suggested that methods of securing public cooperation should be given prominence in personnel training programs, and that mass media should be used to enlist the voluntary cooperation of the public.

11. A description was given of the steps taken in Guinea to combat crime over a certain period. These steps include the establishment of industrial complexes in rural areas in order to limit the internal migration of unskilled workers, a drastic reduction in imports of alcohol, and the dismissal of any worker found in a state of intoxication. It is claimed that these measures have markedly decreased criminality.

12. While to some participants affluence appeared to be a contributory cause, others said that it was not necessarily true that social and economic change was always followed by an increase in crime.

13. Economic development is at present the dominant preoccupation of developing countries. It was therefore urged that developing countries should at least include social scientists in their planning committees, in order to prevent possibly criminogenic elements from being included in development plans. Those aspects of crime prevention which relate to the role of the public and of the family, to educational facilities and to occupational opportunities should be taken into account when economic development plans are drawn up.

14. Participants emphasized the role of the family as an essential social force in the prevention of delinquency. Industrialization is said to encourage delinquency as adolescents become labour units rather than individuals. Migration from country to town weakens the cohesion of the family; and the attitude of adolescents towards their parents undergoes a change, to such an extent that parental control weakens and children are left to drift into reprehensible behavior. Instead of relying on their family for guidance, the adolescents tend to reject it.

Industrialization also alters the behavior of parents towards their children when both father and mother go to work and the children are left with aged persons who cannot keep them under proper control.

15. It was suggested that the State should establish social assistance committees and guidance centers and, in certain cases, provide allowances to strengthen families in need of help, and that negligent families should be penalized. Youngsters can best be influenced in a "face-to-face" group like the family. If the functions and structure of the family change or grow weaker, other "face-to-face" groups must be found to replace it; for example, in case of abandonment by the parents, the best solution is to rear the abandoned children not in an institution but in carefully selected foster-homes.

16. According to certain research studies, a high proportion of adult offenders were maladjusted and delinquent as children; a large percentage suffer from personality distortions, mental tensions and conflicts, and faulty habits; many of them come from broken homes or from homes in which the parents were not competent to carry out their duties efficiently; many delinquent children left school too early and received neither sufficient academic education nor useful vocational training. This research also shows that a large proportion of young adult offenders have never established even rudimentary habits of continuous and efficient work; that the highest proportion of delinquent children spring from communities in which processes of deterioration and disintegration are marked, manifesting themselves in certain cultural standards in conflict with the standards of the majority of citizens, and that inadequate programs of probation, parole and institutional treatment also have much to do with recidivism.

17. Anthropologists, social scientists, psychologists and medical officers should participate and collaborate in a greater measure on research on the prevention of crime.

18. The need for comparative criminology is urgent; it should involve replication of experiments in different areas. This would help to determine which of the etiological factors are constants and which are attributable to conditions peculiar to regional culture.

19. Prediction devices are another important area of research as a means of identifying potential delinquents at an early stage and of making timely intervention possible; prediction will also help to make the administration of criminal justice more efficient.

20 There is a serious need for the collection of more detailed and accurate data by the police and courts. Only if the extent of reported and hidden crime is known can adequate provision be made to combat it. Sociological studies in the population should also be undertaken. Evaluation machinery should be introduced into any project as from the planning stage so that it will be more easily possible to assess the result on a reliable basis. This calls for the assistance of social scientists in action programs.

21. There is also a great scarcity of ascertainable knowledge about the effects of preventive measures, and consequently much more research in this field is needed. Consideration should be given to the question of how best to publicize scientific experiments conducted in various countries. While some speakers stated that the real need was for applying the research ideas embodied in existing material, others emphasized the need for further research.

22. By virtue of its teaching-learning function and its function as an agent of change, the school has a great responsibility for influencing children and adolescents for good or for ill. A positive and diagnostic attitude towards the behaviour of the pupil, a greater differentiation of instruction in keeping with the wide range of individual differences among the pupils and a meaningful cirriculum for those pupils for whom purely academic objectives do not represent a reasonable and realistic goal, are essential. The core of the curriculum should be the communication of skills, proper use of leisure and training in occupational skills. Every effort should be made to improve group dynamics which involve different cultural attitudes and inter-personal relationships, since this hidden learning process often provides more effective learning experiences that are apparent from the visible curriculum. If teachers are to become sensitive observers and to intervene effectively in the handling of potentially maladjusted children and young persons, due attention will need to be paid in their recruitment to personality and professional training. The teachers should serve as examples through the development of strong inter-personal relationships, in order to combat the anonymity, impersonality and boredom which combine to produce a school drop-out, if not a delinquent.

23. The school, to the extent to which it can afford it, should provide and maintain certain special and essential services such as those of a doctor, psychologist, a social worker. Pupils vulnerable or exposed to the development of delinquent behaviour could be identified at an early stage by the teacher, and the early referral of such pupils to the appropriate agency could forestall more serious problems. Special attention should be given to such groups as pupils with difficulties, truants, poor readers, academic failures and school drop-outs as part of the most vulnerable group.

24. The school should improve its partnership role within the total community complex of health and welfare agencies and the homes of the children. These co-operative programs may include efforts by the school and the police, school action in conjunction with agencies of mass communication, extension of schooling to include adult education and action research programs conducted jointly by school and research institutes.

25. There is a close relationship between maladjustment and delinquency in children. The same type of background that makes one child maladjusted may make another delinquent. There is evidence that a high correlation exists between bad behaviour and poor school performance on the one hand, and delinquent behaviour on the other. Some of these cases, it was said, might be due to demonstrable medico-psychological factors, which could in fact be handled by trained professionals. Deviation of intelligence from the average, reaction to sexual development in the older children, sibling rivalry and emotional upheaval at home may drive a child to delinquency. For all these and other similar reasons, it is essential that medico-psychological services should be made available to schools. Teachers should realize that there is often some medical or psychological reason for a child's bad behaviour and poor performance.

26. An example was given of the remedial class and tutorial class created to meet the needs of particular children in Israel, by establishing rehabilitation in which elementary school subjects and trades were taught by special teaching methods which developed in the pupils pride in their achievements. The negative competitive aspects of schooling, which might previously have contributed to maladjustment were eliminated. The curricula were designed to enable the pupils to progress at their own speed. Similarly, the classifying centres for delinquent children provide a way of placing different types of children in appropriate approved schools.

27. While it was stated by some that illiteracy tended to promote delinquency, others expressed the view that keen competition for higher education had been one of the causes of juvenile delinquency because of the frustration suffered by those left behind in the struggle. Priority is given to success in examinations, and emotional discipline and moral education are disregarded.

28. It was said that education should include in its program the inculcation of moral and spiritual values, and that the role of religion in education is important.

29. The education of parents is essential to their understanding of their children and the maintenance of healthy parent-child relationships.

30. Participants stressed the part played in juvenile delinquency and adult criminality by insufficient education, the absence of inadequacy or vocational training, and by the lack of opportunity, of work habits and of recreational facilities.

31. As regards the role of occupational opportunities it was emphasized that attention should be paid to sound, healthy attitudes, as well as skills. Some school children have been given orientation courses towards occupation before they leave school, and these have been found to be profitable with young people who had shown little interest in school work. Such programs could help them to realize the value of their particular job in the general scheme.

32. Educational programs should be adjusted to the changing world. Education and vocational training are not at present in keeping with the type and number of occupational opportunities available. Educational and training programs should, therefore, be preceded by economic surveys of the employment markets for a number of years ahead.

33. The organization of suitable vocational training and of an effective placement system is a major social responsibility. Youth employment agencies should co-operate with teachers, child welfare workers and social workers.

34. Where there is large-scale unemployment, especially in developing countries, it is difficult to find jobs for young persons. Methods which have been used to cope with such large-scale unemployment include the use of youth camps, youth brigades and agricultural settlements.

35. Unemployment for reasons other than economic was also discussed. An example was given of a project in which youths who could not attend vocational training courses because of inadequate elementary education are taught elementary school subjects, as well as trades. Special teaching methods had to be developed to engender in the students a personal pride in their achievement.

36. It was suggested that, to gain a better understanding of the appropriate measures to be introduced, it will be necessary to study types of delinquency and homogeneous groups of offenders. The study of the family should include both families of orientation and procreation.

37. The school provides an excellent environment in which longitudinal studies can be carried out; since the peak age of criminality is very low in the industrialized countries, it is feasible to study the development of a large proportion of the criminal population in the school.

38. In developing countries, where society had been able until the present time to support a certain amount of deviant behaviour, it would be enlightening to study whether the unemployment in developing communities will increase the crime rate, and how far community tolerance of greater deviant behaviour can be stretched.

39. The result of vocational training given in prisons requires study.

40. Emphasis was laid on the need for co-operation between research workers and practical field workers and it was noted that the latter should be influenced in their policy by the result of scientific research.

AGENDA ITEM III - COMMUNITY PREVENTIVE ACTION (with particular reference to the planning and implementation of medical, police and social programs.)
RAPPORTEUR: Miss Zuleika Sucupira Kenworthy

1. The main attention was devoted to the co-ordination and planning of measures and means of prevention.

2. It is perceived more plainly nowadays that, the more complex society becomes, the more difficult it is for the individual to abide by the law and uphold public order. It then becomes necessary to intensify the action of the community on each of its members, in order to reduce the risks of criminality.

3. In formulating policies and programs designed to foster a general improvement in living conditions or directly to prevent criminality, it is important to take into account the peculiarities and needs of each area, as well as the ways and means available to those who are to prepare and apply the policies and programs in question. The term "community" should therefore be understood not only in the national sense but also, on occasion, in the area or local sense of the term.

4. Several participants considered that, the higher the crime rate in an area or nation, the more desirable it was to centralize the programs and means brought into play. Such centralization would appear to make it possible to mobilize the potential positive forces in a society more quickly in order to avert phenomena of maladjustment.

5. Preventive measures are needed urgently throughout the world, though the degree of urgency varies from place to place. Criminality can be regarded as a lesion in society. Society must be mobilized to take, by adopting certain positive attitudes, cognizance of that lesion and action to prevent it. The more clearly a community perceives that its interests are directly at stake, the more dynamic, committed and active it will be in applying measures of community development. Efforts must be made to demonstrate more cogently that criminality is the direct concern of the community and of each of its members, not only in view of its moral effects but, by the same token, because of its economic impact. A nation's judicial, police and curative institutions require investment on a substantial scale. The citizen who is required to contribute to that investment through taxation must be convinced that the investment of more sizeable funds to promote preventive action is an economically profitable undertaking in the long run.

6. It was pointed out by way of example that all too often crime becomes easier in the towns, whereas a different attitude on the part of the community should make it more difficult.

7. Among the many illustrations offered by the participants we may mention that of Israel, where a "repopulation quarter" is being set up on an experimental basis; this is a sort of young people's city, situated near a town, and all the social services taking part in the anti-illiteracy campaign using individualized treatment are integrated in a highly functional manner from the outset.

8. In Mexico a Department of Social Prevention has been established with the principal aim of harnessing of the positive forces latent in the communities. This Department is headed by community development specialists who are endeavouring to avoid the proliferation of Government and private action and to co-ordinate it into convergent, and therefore more effective, channels of effort.

9. Several participants stated in support of current experiments that there appeared to be much to gain by twinning central or local co-ordination bodies with research centres. Uganda is a case in point.

10. In India the action is co-ordinated by the central co-ordination agencies with a view to community development in all its aspects, including the prevention of crime.

11. In Thailand, where the crime rate doubled between 1962 and 1964, a National Centre for the Study of Youth Problems was established in conjunction with the National Research Council in 1963.

12. In the USSR the State, as co-ordinator, endeavours to entrust the work of prevention to local bodies whenever possible. The participation of various cells of the community is thus developed directly and the work of the State specialists is extended by volunteers. The procurator acts as the motive force in co-ordinating prevention efforts.

13. In the United States, instructive experiments in prevention are being made by small groups of citizens, who mobilize a community's interest in preventing internal disorders and thus spur official and private bodies to practical action.

14. Similar experiments are in progress in Japan.

15. One of the dominant problems of community development arises from the fact that, whereas a fair number of citizens often wish to participate in the prevention of social disorganization, it is difficult to make proper use of them at the right time. It is the function of professional community development officers to foresee the practical measures in which these citizens might participate.

16. In the USSR many experiments have shown that the professional people could play a very important part in preventing crime. It is interesting to discover why one enterprise should have a record of many offences and another be free of them. Methodical studies are being made with a view to eliminating the causes of such offences.

17. In the developing countries, new methods and techniques must be devised to mobilize the vast latent community resources peculiar to each type of civilization, and to harness them for preventive purposes. Stress must be laid, not on the phenomenon of urbanization alone, but chiefly on socio-cultural disintegration. Particular attention should therefore be paid to the consequences of rapid social and technological change, with a view to enabling the community, as this process of change goes on, to intensify the struggle against factors making for maladjustment and to enlist as many of its members as possible in that endeavour. One of the dominant themes of preventive action in these countries is that of enabling young people to acquire good habits of work which are closely co-ordinated with economic progress. Measures of planning for the prevention of maladjustment should therefore be dovetailed--even more closely than in other parts of the world, it would seem--into the nation's general economic policy.

18. Developing countries are essentially countries in process of organization. This, therefore, is a good time at which to co-ordinate the infant structures. Population planning should hold a predominant place in the co-ordination of preventive efforts.

19. Many participants stressed the fact that the co-ordination of preventive efforts calls for specialists who, by using specific methods and techniques suited to each area, will increase the effectiveness of a general will to co-ordinate. All too often, for lack of specialists, this will remains sporadic or achieves no tangible results. It is therefore necessary to specify, for each type of structure, the exact functions it is intended to confer upon these new specialists in the humane sciences. Co-ordination is the fruit, not of friendly meetings, but of precise functional relationships. "Functional co-ordination" means the mechanization of all the agencies involved in order to increase their overall efficiency. Next, it is necessary to interpret the results, to modify policy accordingly, and to re-orient the available means, in accordance with the dynamic process, whenever a new stage is reached.

20. It was stressed that, in many countries, general preventive measures reached only the most exposed groups in the community. It is therefore necessary to institute programs which can reach such groups; street corner groups are an example.

21. Community development must strengthen the sense that, as society is developing at the present time, the individual is increasingly alone in the crowd. This apparent loneliness must be analysed, and suitable measures taken to overcome this trend. The preventive action taken must win the public over. This explains the importance of keeping a community informed, and of the participation of professional preventive staff in the work of specialists in the use of audio-visual information media.

22. The aim to be followed in the development of a community must be to regard one's neighbor, not as an interfering nuisance, but as a companion with whom certain relations can be maintained and certain exchanges carried on. Such development should therefore aim at increasingly high quality in the relations between individuals within a given group.

23. It was pointed out that the education of world public opinion in the matter of racial discrimination was an important form of preventive action in the struggle to stamp out this great crime against mankind.

24. The opinion emerged that, with the mass of information available in most countries, it would be possible even now to draw up much more specific programs of action and apply them without delay but that, at the same time, no effort must be spared--quite the contrary--to step up long-term research work.

25. As societies evolve, new maladies continually appear; in the economically developed countries new nervous diseases are now being diagnosed, schizophrenia is on the increase, and so on. The mental factor plays an important role in criminality. The physician and, above all, the psychiatrist ought not to remain isolated in an ivory tower. It is observed, unfortunately, that in most countries the universities are further accentuating this isolation; the physician is trained as a specialist in therapy without being given a proper chance to familiarize himself with the structure of the society to which he belongs, and without being invited to take an adequate interest in questions of mental health and the prevention of crime.

26. Provided that they do not mechanically copy the Western countries, the developing countries will perhaps be able to arrest, by dynamic action in the mental health field, a great many of the phenomena of mental disorder which beset the economically developed countries.

27. Generally speaking it is found that, if he is to be able to master the whole complex of these problems today, the physician must join working teams composed, among others, of lawyers, sociologists, psychologists and social workers, in which the specialist in each discipline must be neither overestimated nor underestimated; each of them must play his due part, in accordance with his special skills, so that a better understanding may be reached of the behaviour of individuals from the pathological, neurological, psychological, sociological, cultural and other points of view. In view of the rapid changes taking place in social structures, it is important that experiments in interdisciplinary interchange in the humane sciences should be developed and intensified in number and quality. Thus all specialists, including the psychiatrist, should participate in the methodical compilation of dynamic statistics designed to provide information indicative of the prevailing trends.

28. In many countries, young physicians are much more attracted to private practice than to multi-disciplinary work in the field of social prevention. In order to reverse this trend it is necessary to demonstrate the importance of the latter field of endeavour, which will gradually emerge as the most vital of all.

29. In the developing countries, knowledge of prenatal factors and of the emotional attitudes peculiar to tropical areas, in particular, is decisive for the purpose of drawing up a balance-sheet of personality in which positive and negative factors are clearly brought out. The physician can play a leading role in contributing to the understanding of these phenomena and hence in fostering a realistic appreciation of behaviour patterns and of measures calculated to promote the formation of personality and character. This might facilitate, for example, the adaptation of school systems which, when they are based only on schemes left behind from the colonial era, all too often set up behavioural imbalances. In this connection, mention was made of an example furnished by Nigeria: namely, support for parents so that, despite sometimes abrupt socio-cultural phenomena of disintegration, the family nucleus may discern the importance and the new aspects of its educative role.

30. As a behavioural specialist, the physician should be regarded as one of the essential members of the multi-disciplinary teams which every developing country ought to have for the purpose of drawing up and applying its programs of social prevention.

31. All over the world, the need exists to make a thorough study of the deep-rooted motives which underly anti-social attitudes, and to investigate the relationship which exists between certain types of personality and certain actions. These phenomena can be compared with the dominant attitude of a society towards its maladjusted or criminal members, an attitude which sometimes has the effect of crystallizing the unadaptability of such negative behaviour patterns. Hence the need for dynamic action to keep public opinion informed, and for specialists enlisted in multi-disciplinary research and action teams to participate in all the efforts made to mobilize the positive forces of the community.

32. In Zambia, where there are only two psychiatrists for the entire country, an open institution has been established to accommodate a large number of mental patients, including some delinquents in need of psychiatric care. All members of the staff of the institution who have completed their schooling are invited to participate in the treatment of the patients. Every member of the staff is put in charge of five or six cases. This officer, belonging as he does to the same culture as his patients, is particularly well placed to supply the psychiatrist with the requisite information about the patient's social and family habits.

33. While research dealing with juvenile delinquency is still at an early stage, it can help in the planning of projects undertaken either by a public agency or by a voluntary agency, in order to make them as effective as possible and to permit their evaluation. In most countries, the category most vulnerable as potential delinquents is constituted by the young male population between the ages of 12 and 18 years in large cities. The research specialist should be in a position to give advice on prevention programs designed for this category, particularly with respect to ways of stimulating public participation which could complement administrative direction. Such projects should seek to prepare adolescents for adulthood and should go beyond mere vocational training or recreation.

34. Preventive action is the primary function of the police. It is inconceivable nowadays that a police service should not have as its first duty the prevention of crime. Any policeman capable of drawing conclusions from his action should consider, in any case where he notes a breach of the law, whether that breach does not belong to the category of acts which more sustained attention, a better organization of services and the education of the public might have avoided.

35. In all countries, the organic laws governing the police or the codes of criminal procedure refer to the preventive function of the police and so provide the statutory basis for this function.

36. During the debate, reference was made in the first place to the participation of the police in preventive work by means, for example, of guidance services and services responsible for organizing leisure activities. In Sweden, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom a campaign to enlighten public opinion by means of exhibitions, articles in the press, films and television and radio broadcasts is being conducted with success. Its object is in particular to alert public opinion to the serious consequences of certain breaches of the law for the person committing them, for the victim and for the community, and to draw attention to the negligence and carelessness on the part of the victim which provide favourable opportunities for the commission of certain offences. The "advisory services" set up by the Swedish police are proceeding on the same lines.

37. The preventive action of the police with respect to juvenile delinquency is steadily expanding and becoming more diversified; it includes the location of geographical areas which are breeding grounds of delinquency, the detection of young persons in moral danger (e.g. the "'holiday action" in France), the spotting and identification of youth gangs, the tracing (in conjunction with social services) of criminogenic families, lectures given by police officers to teachers, the organization of leisure activities for young persons by means and under the guidance of police clubs for young persons (experiment of the Police Athletic League in New York), the establishment and specialized activities of women police to make contact with families and minors and in particular with girls who commit or are the victims of offences.

38. On the other hand, the expansion of preventive action by the police may possibly introduce a form of police supervision in too many sectors of the community, and it is desirable that the police itself should display the necessary caution with a view to protecting the rights of the individual as well as those of society.

39. There was also some discussion about the contribution which the police can make to the formulation of a policy of social defence. The modern conditions for the training of police officers are the fundamental basis for the development of a spirit and policy of social defence within the police force. In addition, in many countries the police action has as its object social protection and social welfare (Austria, Denmark, United States, Guinea). In particular, the police endeavour to detect persons in danger of recidivism and to prevent cases of recidivism; an example of this approach is the proposed establishment of a service for the prevention of delinquency in the Ministry of the Interior in France.

40. For the purpose of the formulation and implementation of a social defence policy in the police services it would be necessary to set up a police corps which would be strictly preventive and which would not be bound by the routine of maintenance of law and order and criminal investigation and hence would be in a better position to win the support and co-operation of the community.

41. The USSR with its "people's volunteer units" and also Hungary are carrying out interesting experiments for the purpose of strengthening the relationship between the police and the public.

42. For the purpose of co-operation between the public and the police--in cases where this is necessary--the police ought to place itself more fully at the service of the community, that it should expand its information activities, that it should expand its information activities, that it should publicize--without surrounding them with an aura of mystery--its activities, means, limitations and achievements and that it should co-operate with the social services and with the social science specialists who, at different levels, are concerned with the protection of society.

43. Social services vary greatly in outward form, not only from country to country but often from area to area within the same country. Specific sociological factors may, as a matter of history, have strongly influenced the inception of social services and then their development which, indeed, has too often been a pragmatic process hitherto. Thus some areas have given a disproportionate place to facilities of a particular type, with the result that the policy applied has had to be revised later on, sometimes at great expense.

44. It is easier to appreciate nowadays the degree to which the social services connected with prevention have grown up unplanned and without adequate co-ordination. This realization should make it possible to draw up, both locally and nationally, specific programs designed to equip the social services with functional machinery suited to the needs as they can best be assessed.

45. The participants were unanimous in recognizing that the first requirements to be met by the machinery of preventive social services are that it must offer the widest choice of possibilities and that it must be highly adaptable both to individual needs and to the needs of groups of varying size.

46. High-level co-ordination is the only means of maintaining unity of action and a satisfactory standard of quality in the work done, inter alia through multidisciplinary interchange.

47. In many countries the juvenile-court judges have encouraged, through the understanding they show for social problems, co-operation by the judiciary both with social services working in the field and with boarding institutions.

48. In many countries the social services are focussing their efforts of support and prevention increasingly on the family nucleus. To strengthen the family, to improve the behaviour of its members and to preserve good relations within it: these are important features of immediate action for the prevention of juvenile delinquency. Among the examples given, mention may be made of the new Italian legislation on the prevention of delinquency, which gives prominence to social action of the type described, which is centered more closely on the family. The experiments being made in Syria, Sweden (prevention of alcoholism), Yugoslavia (social assistance centres), the USSR and the Federal Republic of Germany are proceeding along the same lines. Thus, whereas social services were originally limited to child welfare, they are now evolving in the direction of family and social preventive action.

49. As regards efforts made to cater more effectively for specific local factors, recent positive experiments demonstrate that in an urban environment it is often advantageous to decentralize the preventive social services--to divide up the town, as has been done in some cities in the United States, India and Pakistan, into several sectors, and to equip each sector according to its economic, social and cultural needs. This experiment in the decentralization of social services within one and the same urban area has as its corollary very strict co-ordination and dynamic research at the policy-making level.

50. In Denmark social and institutional facilities for small children--nurseries, day nurseries, kindergartens and the like--set up for the use of families with pre-school children, form a direct part of the social services responsible for preventing maladjustment and delinquency. Furthermore the strengthening of the family nucleus through the creation of special facilities for infants in each urban quarter fosters the establishment of positive intra-family relationships which are bound to prove beneficial throughout the educative process.

51. Many participants stressed the need to create and multiply opportunities for co-operation with volunteer workers headed by professional members of the social services. Volunteer workers, whose contact with the public is often closer than that of the professional staff, can take very positive action to keep the community better informed and to win its support for the work in progress, as witness for example the Volunteer Committees in Australia.. It is true that the relations between volunteer and professional workers are full of pitfalls, but these are of little account compared with the vast benefits to be derived from such co-operation; that is one of the strengths of the system in so far as it seeks to involve a whole community in working towards a healthy society. In the last analysis it may be regarded as the only means of bringing about community development and the formation of a positive social outlook in order to combat maladjustment and criminality.

AGENDA ITEM IV - MEASURES TO COMBAT RECIDIVISM (with particular reference to adverse conditions pending trial and inequality in the administration of justice)

RAPPORTEUR: Mr. Norval Morris

1. There was general agreement on the great social importance of the problems of recidivism, and important topics were selected for disucssion on which it was believed a useful contribution could be made to the advancement of knowledge and practice in the struggle in all countries to reduce recidivism.

2. For countries reporting increased rates of recidivism in terms of the return to penal institutions of those previously imprisoned, it was noted that these figures at least in part reflected an increasing use of non-institutional measures for young offenders and first offenders in most countries of the world, with the result that those who do come into the prisons and other correctional institutions tend to be more firmly set in criminal ways when they are first received into the institution.

Research and the prevention of recidivism

3. There was general agreement of the urgent need for more scientifically established knowledge to deal with the many problems involved in reducing recidivism. It was noted, however, that social action could not await research validation and that it is frequently necessary and wise to act on the best professional opinion now; but it was agreed that all action programs should be accompanied by an effort to evaluate their results and to draw the product of research into their further development.

4. It was stressed that research projects in this field need not be of great complexity nor sophistication. Each country, within its resources of research personnel and finances, should endeavor to build the basic information necessary to rational social planning in this field.

Arrest, bail and detention pending trail

5. It was generally agreed that there was widespread discrimination in the exercise of the discretions to arrest and detain suspected persons, operating adversely to those of lesser financial resources and social position. It was agreed that this discrimination, where it existed, had a criminogenic effect tending to embitter and alienate persons so treated and to make their rehabilitation--if they should later be convicted--of appreciably greater difficulty.

6. Participants from some countries, reporting the disappearance of economic and social discrimination, tended to regard this problem of less immediate importance; but there was unanimity on the aim of reducing so far as possible the needless arrest and detention of suspected persons, and of detaining them in custody only when such a course was absolutely necessary for the protection of society. It was agreed that a bail system, linking as it does freedom and financial resources, should be modified so far as possible to avoid this discriminatory consequence. Generally speaking, there was the consensus that, to date, the State has too greatly favored its own convenience at the cost of the liberty of the suspected and accused person.

7. Certain developments having as their purpose the reduction of detention pending trail were discussed, it being the sense of the discussion that experimentation of this nature was to be welcomed with the aim of exorcising so far as possible financial considerations from the granting of liberty to the accused person. Apart from considerations of human rights, this aim was welcomed as a means of avoiding the criminogenic effects of unfair and unduly prolonged detention.

8. The practices discussed were: reporting regularly to the police while awaiting trial; the retention of the suspects or accused persons' documents of identity pending trial; house arrest; the reliance on the personal assurances of reliable people of integrity in the community that the accused will appear for trial; and the Manhattan Bail Study, which demonstrated the value of social investigation of the circumstances of arrested and accused persons to guide the courts in permitting such persons to be at large pending trial.

9. It was further agreed that, in those cases where it is necessary to detain accused persons pending trial, such detention should be as brief as possible. The view was expressed that punishment too long delayed may be unjust punishment and may well have an effect of increasing the incidence of recidivism and, in the case of those later found not guilty, its serious interference with the balance of their lives and that of their family needs no elaboration. The practice in Turkey was reported by which, if a person is detained in custody awaiting trail and is then acquitted, he will be compensated financially for that detention.

10. There was some discussion concerning conditions of detention prior to trial. Several participants expressed the opinion that the unconvicted person awaiting trail should in all circumstances be kept separate from convicted persons. Others doubted the necessity for this in all cases, since they considered that it depended in part on the size of penal institutions in the country (if they are small the need for such segregation is less great) and on the financial resources of the country in question.

11. The question was raised whether the treatment program should ever begin--on a volunatry basis--during the detention period, and whether voluntary work should be offered to the detained person; risks in such practices were noted. No consensus emerged on these questions, which were nevertheless regarded as of importance and worthy of further study and research.

Unjustified disparity of sentences

12. It was the firm consensus that fair sentencing and the fair and even-handed administration of justice is a cornerstone of the struggle against crime and recidivism. Unjustified disparity of sentences was noted in many parts of the world--by this was meant not different sentences for similar crimes, which is a necessary and desirable concomitant of a system of rationally individualized justice, but the application of different sentencing principles to offenders alike in terms of crime, criminal record, personality and social dangerousness. It was agreed that disparity of this nature has a serious adverse effect on the effort to reduce recidivism.

13. Even those who reported the disappearance of social and economic inequities within their countries agreed that such unfair disparity of sentences must be avoided; procedures were described which involved members of the local community in the sentencing process for this and other crime and delinquency preventing purposes.

14. Equal justice under law, an agreed aim, requires the collaboration of the judiciary at all stages of the crime prevention and treatment process. Developments in several countries were noted aiming at improving the sentencing process. The program of training for magistrates in the United Kingdom and the preparation of guides to sentencing to assist the courts in several countries were welcomed. An important development in the United States of America, outlined in the ensuing paragraph, was also regarded as worthy of consideration with a view to emulation elsewhere.

15. The eight judges of the Federal District Court of the Eastern District of Michigan have developed a Sentencing Council. This involves the independent study of the pre-sentence report by a panel of at least three judges, who endeavor to identify and give appropriate weight to the several factors relevant to the optimum disposition. Each judge indicates his suggested sentence and then they meet, together with the chief probation officer, to discuss their recommendations and their reasons supporting it. Each judge, of course, reflects in his presentation his personal background of experience and philosophy, and the judge with the responsibility for pronouncing sentence emerges with the benefit of the varied experiences and insights of his colleagues. The sentencing judge is not obliged to change his original proposed disposition. However, over its four years' experience, the work of the Council has resulted in a drastic reduction in disparity of sentences. The Council has introduced into the sentencing function the values of group decision. It affords a substantial protection to both the community and the offender from the consequences of individual whim, idiosyncracy or bias. It also has enabled the Court to develop a group philosophy on the appropriate factors in formulating the proper sentence in given circumstances.

16. It was recognized that the court, in fulfilling its onerous burden of rational and even-handed justice, must be better guided by the product of research studies designed to discover the effects of different sentences on diverse groups of offenders; it was the sense of the discussion that this could be achieved without any risk of interference with human rights in the acquisition of such knowledge. The fact was not overlooked, of course, that in imposing a sentence the court has also to fulfil purposes of ensuring public confidence in the administration of justice and the protection of the public; that criminal sanctions may have a generally deterrent as well as a rehabilitative purpose; but here too the need for research to provide guidance as to the truth of this expectation and the facts of this effect was noted and approved.

Reducing the ambit of operation of the criminal law

17. There was some discussion of the wisdom of excluding young persons from the operation of the traditional criminal law system, including that of the juvenile or children's court. Several participants expressed a strong preference for early intervention by other than judicial agencies in anti-social behavior by children. Participants from the United Kingdom outlined developments in England and Scotland moving to an extent away from their established system of juvenile courts and towards the system of child welfare boards, as in Scandinavia, but preserving the power of judicial control of such intervention by the State by way of appeal to the courts.

18. The particular problems of women offenders, of persons accused and convicted of motoring offences, and of persons accused and convicted of offences involving drunkenness or the taking of narcotics were mentioned, with a view to their exclusion from traditional criminal law processes or the modification of such processes to deal with their particular problems; no consensus emerged on this point.

Crimes against peace and humanity

19. Several participants expressed the view that crimes against peace and humanity were of such gravity and so seriously influence public confidence in the administration of justice that to neglect their condign punishment would have a tendency to increase crime and recidivism generally in the community. They therefore strongly opposed procedures by which statutes of limitations should be allowed to run so as to exclude such offenders from the control of and punishment by the criminal law.

Availability of legal aid for arrested, accused and convicted persons

20. There was unanimity on the need to provide legal assistance to arrested and accused persons, and to those convicted of crime who may wish to appeal. Systems of court appointment of counsel for those who could not themselves afford or obtain adequate legal representation were described, but it was the general view that such a system may have the defect of providing legal assistance at too late a stage in the proceedings and at a time when an adequate defence is difficult hurriedly to prepare. It was therefore felt that adequate and timely legal assistance must be available as of right to all arrested and accused persons at a sufficiently early stage in the criminal process adequately to protect their human rights and to ensure the fair and non-discriminatory application of the criminal law to all citizens. This aim is justified not only in terms of human rights and social decency, but also because the failure to provide adequate legal aid may well leave the convicted person with a sense of injustice which greatly complicates the task of encouraging and assisting him to eschew criminal conduct in the future: the lack of an adequate legal aid system thus tends to increase recidivism.

Conditions in penal institutions

21. Classification and treatment techniques aimed at preventing and minimizing recidivism were discussed. Much attention was devoted to the important problems of training prison staff and other correctional officers for their difficult work, the opinion being expressed that in many countries such training programs were rudimentary, with the result that a valuable source of rehabilitative effort was neglected.

22. Problems of the employment of prisoners, their accommodation, their supervision inside and outside correctional institutions were discussed, and there was general agreement that treatment within and outside the institution, for those who are sent to a penal institution and released under supervision thereafter, is a continuum, and must be planned to provide a continuous and integrated retraining and rehabilitating program. Some opinion in favor of the administrative integration of prison and parole staffs was expressed as one means of ensuring this continuity of treatment.

23. It was recognized that correctional treatment is an entity, not something done at special times and by special members of the prison staff. Security and custody measures may well be a necessary element in such treatment programs, but they should not be overvalued at the cost of other necessary elements in those programs. On this topic, several participants reported a greatly increased use of open institutions to replace closed security prisons. In this connection it was noted that in Hong Kong all offenders under twenty-one years of age are first classified to open institutions as a matter of routine, and in Denmark there are open institutions for recidivists serving terms of up to four years.

24. There was widespread agreement on the need to mobilize community support to assist the rehabilitation of convicted offenders, and various methods were described of marshalling such support and allowing it expression.

Conclusion

25. There was recognition of the fact that it is easier to point to defects in methods of minimizing recidivism than to achieve the social action necessary for the elimination of those defects; on this topic the gap between precept and practice, between agreed aims and present achievements, is very great. Means of narrowing this gap were discussed and two such were throught to merit particular attention. First, in every country a continuing effort should be made to involve the judiciary and the organized legal profession in the prevention and treatment of crime; secondly, on-going continuing research evaluating of current and developing methods of preventing recidivism is a necessity if social protection is to be achieved, human suffering minimized, and financial waste avoided.

AGENDA ITEM V - PROBATION (ESPECIALLY ADULT PROBATION) AND OTHER NON-INSTITUTIONAL MEASURES

RAPPORTEUR: Mr. Maarten E. Tjaden

1. Probation in its various forms is a treatment measure which is very flexible in its application. It has developed to the point where it may now be considered as a treatment method in its own right, by means of which an offender may be reintegrated into society without recourse to traditional methods of correction. Its results are particularly striking wherever it has been integrated in the cultural patterns and social setting.

2. It is well established that probation provides sufficient safeguards for the protection of society, while retaining its unique quality of adaptability to individual needs and pressures. Thus, it may be regarded as a major element in penal policy in both the developing and the developed countries. In countries which rely on traditional methods of punishment, its introduction would be a major step in the evolution of penal policies.

3. In many countries, probation began as a treatment measure for juvenile delinquents and was subsequently extended to adult first offenders; in some countries it is even used as a treatment measure for recividists. Reference was made to unofficial or para-judicial forms of probation whereby an offender could be spared an appearance in court if he could prove to the satisfaction of the authorities that he was making a genuine effort to change his behaviour. In this connection, reference was made to the system of "prosecutor's probation" practiced in Japan, for example, although there was no provision for it in law.

4. The development and efficient use of probation would be impeded if the sentencing authorities were excessively restricted by legislative provisions confining its application to specific categories of offenders or offenses.

5. On the other hand, it was submitted that probation officers tended to advocate a more selective policy since this would minimize the failure rate and so make the probation system itself more acceptable to the public.

6. In the selection of offenders for probation, the sentencing authority should be guided by a pre-sentence investigation providing the necessary information about the personality of the offender, his family history, social background, work record, and some indication of this suitability for probation. It was observed that in the actual selection process for probation, the approach should be social rather than purely clinical.

7. The question of the confidential nature of the pre-sentence report was raised, and while it was conceded that the offender might have a right to know what the report said about him, the withholding of certain information sometimes became inevitable. The opinion was expressed that perhaps a balance might be struck between the requirements of confidentiality and the desirability of free access to information by providing for a discussion between the offender and the probation officer on the contents of the report before it was submitted to the sentencing authority.

8. A decision regarding a probation order is generally based, in great measure, on the pre-sentence report. Since human lives could be ruined because of judicial action based on erroneous information contained in the pre-sentence report, great care should be taken to ensure that the data contained in the report was accurate and not distorted by gossip or hearsay. In this connection, the possibility of an appellate review of a decision concerning probation was raised, and it was observed that such a review had been provided for in recent years in a number of jurisdictions, for example, in the United States.

9. The probation officer's time should generally be divided in a rational way among the functions he is to discharge. It was observed that pre-sentence investigation and routine administrative work often take up too much of his time, with the result that he is unable to give sufficient attention to supervisory and case-work functions.

10. A note of warning was sounded regarding the danger of what was termed "an information explosion." It was suggested that more effort should be devoted to the development of practical scientific techniques for gathering only useful and relevant information. A suggestion was made, in this connection, that pre-sentence investigations should be carried out by special diagnostic units rather than by probation officers.

11. Since probation is a form of treatment in the community, its development requires the acceptance and support of the public. It was stated that the expansion of probation was hampered by an insufficient realization on the part of the public that this method is in fact an efficient means of preventing crime. Even today, probation is often criticized as being too lenient a measure. It was said that this lack of understanding also influences legislators and judges, inasmuch as the administration of justice cannot diverge too far from public opinion. Among other things, these attitutdes are reflected in the insufficient allocation of funds for the adequate staffing of the probation organization.

12. Hence, it must be made clear that probation serves not only the interest of the offender but also that of the public, and is not inconsistent with public security. The cooperation of volunteers and the support of social groups and associations, such as trade unions and employers' federations, could further the development of probation and promote its full acceptance in a country.

13. The public should be made aware that probation is one of the least costly and most effective ways of combating criminality. It was observed in this connection that certain experiments conducted in the United States had effectively demonstrated the validity of this contention.

14. Nation-wide campaigns to change public attitudes and win public support for probation and other non-institutional treatment measures should be vigorously promoted. In this connection, note was taken of the public campaigns effected regularly in Japan and in the Netherlands. Mass communication media and non-governmental organizations could play a vital role in this respect.

15. Although there is still much to be learned about the effectiveness of probation, it seems clear that in many countries probation has had a favorable influence on the rate of recidivism, and has contributed to reducing the prison population. In the Netherlands, for instance, the prison population of about 2,000 has remained fairly constant despite a doubling of the general population in the last 25 years. It was said that this favorable ratio was closely connected with the development of probation in that country; over 19,000 adults are now under probation supervision.

16. It was urged that countries, particularly those whose prisons were overcrowded, should take steps to introduce or expand the probation system. The United Nations was asked to take appropriate action to help those countries to achieve these objectives.

17. In many countries, particularly in developing countries, the use of probation for adults is hampered by a number of factors: the probation system cannot simply be transplanted to cultural settings different from those where it was devised; the legal framework does not lend itself easily to the introduction of the probation system; trained judges and trained personnel are either lacking or insufficient; and in general, the lack of public support for the probation system. Gradual steps for the purpose of introducing probation were recommended as the best approach, in order that the public should come to realize that probation does not involve a greater risk to society than do more traditional methods. In some countries, general feelings of mistrust towards adult probation were reported to have lessened in recent years.

18. Community action in the field of probation is important. A social group, for instance, can be put to use in probation treatment as a source of pressure on the offender to change his attitudes and behavior. The social group may be a spontaneous entity, or it may be specifically constituted for the purpose of exerting psychological pressure on the probationer placed within it. This method of group work has the additional merit of allowing the probation officer to give more of his time to those probationers who particularly need individual attention. Group counseling methods, it was noted, have proved particularly successful with hostile and aggressive young adult probationers.

19. Treatment should not necessarily be restricted to the probationer, but could, in some cases, be advantageously extended to his family, particularly through family-centered interviews. The purpose of such action is to bring together all members of the probationer's family and impress on them their share of responsibility in his rehabilitation.

20. Constructive human relations between the probationer and his supervisor are an essential element in rehabilitation. It was observed in this connection that, according to the results of specific research, the transfer of cases from one supervisior to another tended to have harmful effects. The danger of overburdening a probation officer with administrative duties was also stressed; such a burden would be detrimental to the therapeutic relationship which he is expected to establish and maintain with the probationer.

21. The rehabilitation of the probationer depends to a great extent on the competence of the probation officer. The problem of obtaining qualified staff seems to be a cause for concern everywhere. In many countries this problem is compounded by the inadequacy of training facilities which, among other disadvantages, hinders the extension of the probation system. In addition to the relevant academic training required in most of the developed countries, it was pointed out that the probation officer should have such personal qualities as would enhance and enrich his relationship with the probationer.

22. The matching of probationers with probation officers according to age and to the need for either authoritative or supportive guidance should help to increase the effectiveness of treatment in the community. It was pointed out that such matching was particularly important for the younger age groups, and that sometimes young adult males were better helped by female probation officers and vice versa. In the case of voluntary workers, the social milieu of the offender should be taken into account as much as possible by assigning the probationer to a supervisor from the same socio-economic group in order to facilitate understanding and constructive influence.

23. The need to bridge the gap between institutional and non-institutional treatment methods was stressed. Many participants emphasized the usefulness of community-based residential centers, hostels and "half-way houses" for persons who were unable to adjust themselves to life in the community. A strong plea was made for the increase of such facilities, particularly in urban and industrialized areas. In conjunction with furloughs, work-release to the community and pre-release training centers, it was observed that such measures can help the offender to make a gradual adjustment to life in freedom and so tend to prevent recidivism.

24. It was stated that there was a striking parallel between the evolution of the prison regime and that of methods of treatment in freedom, in that both were becoming more flexible and diversified. Institutional treatment, in some of its forms, is approximating to probation and, to some extent, probation and other measures of treatment in freedom are tending to resemble certain methods of institutional treatment. As a consequence, there is often a confusion in terminology when describing the role of probation and that of parole after release from an institution. It was even suggested that one possible reason why the use of probation was not increasing in some countries was that institutional treatment itself was coming to be regarded as more therapeutic. It is therefore natural to conclude that treatment ought to form one continuous process and that it would be desirable to merge the administrations responsible for the different phases of correctional treatment.

25. A number of participants urged that judges, probation officers, sociologists and prison officials should be encouraged to cooperate in team work, to establish systematic contacts with each other, to seek new approaches and to experiment. Administrators and policy-makers should be given opportunities to test new methods and introduce methods of treatment in keeping with local conditions, without running the risk of being personally penalized in case of failure.

26. There was widespread support for unification of the relevant services with a view to achieving a more constructive relationship between them, for a commonly accepted penal philosophy for prison and probation officers, and for common training principles. Support for such integration was seen as one of the most important factors emerging from the discussions. Advantages were also seen in the application of more uniform policies by the courts and in increased possibilities for experiment. This would include group action and individual attention to the most difficult cases.

27. Action toward a unified service was said to be needed from within and from the top levels of the administrations concerned. The convening of conferences and, more specifically, seminars at which to exchange experience was seen as important in encouraging this development.

28. In view of this trend towards flexibility, new treatment research and the development of a treatment continuum, as well as the establishment of a unified service, it was submitted that a purely negative attitude towards the combination of institutional and non-institutional measures is not justified.

29. On the other hand, the combination of a fine with probation was reported to be an effective measure in Japan.

30. From a brief discussion of non-institutional measures other than probation, it appeared that in some countries the stay of prosecution or deferment of judgment yielded favorable results when combined with voluntary probation whereby the offender is entrusted to his fellow workers. It was said that very few of the cases so handled subsequently came to trial.

31. Extra-mural labor based on the idea of rehabilitation through work was found to offer prospects as a particularly useful form of penal sanction of an intermediate character between the fine and deprivation of liberty. As a recent example, extra-mural employment for petty offenders has been introduced in Kenya, resulting in a reduction of approximately 40 per cent in prison committals.

32. Mention was made of new developments in several East European countries whereby the judge is empowered to apply conditional suspension of prison sentences and of sentences of corrective labor without imprisonment.

33. Restitution to the victim, in one form or another, was advocated as a separate and constructive means of penal action and crime prevention. The successful experiment reported from Ghana was noted in this connection, and further attention to the matter was invited.

34. While limited research undertaken on certain pilot projects in institutional and non-institutional treatment in recent years would seem to indicate better success rates for those experimental groups which had been given more intense treatment than the control groups (by doubling the number of social workers, for instance), it was admitted that there still were wide gaps in knowledge referring to different risk categories and other matters. Control groups should be used in order to identify the individual factors affecting the results. Efforts should be made to establish much closer relations between practitioners and universities as well as research bodies. It was recognized that those responsible could not wait for the completion of the studies undertaken, and that it was essential to continue practical efforts in the directions indicated above.

35. In a general way, research and experience have so far shown that probation and related measures could safely be expanded within the general framework of modern criminal policy.

AGENDA ITEM VI - SPECIAL PREVENTIVE AND TREATMENT MEASURES FOR YOUNG ADULTS

RAPPORTEUR: Mr. Duncan Fairn

1. Discussion on this agenda item disclosed wide variations in the definition of the term young adult. The chronological age limits for the "young adult" category as defined in legislation and regulations seemed to fall into one of two basic patterns. One, and this seemed to be the predominant pattern, fixed the age range of young adults from the upper limit for juvenile delinquents (usually between 15 and 18 years) to a maximum of 21 years. The trend in this first pattern seemed to be towards a raising of the upper age limit to 24 years; and, in one particular case--under a recent amendment to the Federal Youth Correction Act of the United States of America--to a maximum of 26 years. The second pattern set the young adult group between the ages of 15 and 17. This lack of precise defintion was matched by the admitted absence of fundamental research, and especially research derived from understanding between the research worker and the practitioner in the field. In addition, in most countries, the young adult group is recognized as a definable entity either by statute or by some other means; the basis for such recognition has often been impelled by tradition or such other factors as physiological maturity, prevailing cultural expectation and social and economic responsibility. These considerations produced a consensus that each country should establish its own criteria for identifying the young adult, that whatever criteria are established must be based upon realistic factors and that legal defnintions and national youth policies should be determined in accordance with these realistic considerations.

2. There is also some variation in the incidence of young adult crime. A proportionately low or declining incidence of crime was reported for some countries but others reported great concern both because of the increasing incidence and beacuse of the seriousness of the crimes committed; the young adult offender was invariably the young adult male. In some countries, it was observed, the young adult male was responsible for at least half of the total volume of the serious cirme reported; and the fact very few crimes involving young adult females were reported was ascribed by some speakers partly to the tendency of parents and the public to protect young women by concealing their actions and partly to the greater hold of the family on them.

3. Despite the difference in definition and incidence, a common anxiety was voiced during the discussion. In all countries, it was observed, the young adult group merits special attention because its potential could present immense social danger, as well as unlimited opportunity for social development.

4. In some countries, the young adult age group constitutes a very hign percentage of the total population, and in these countries it is particularly important to be alert to the group's potential for social revolt or for social reconstruction.

5. Despite the failure to promote adequate research, there was a general recognition of the effects of social forces on youth, of the influence of the mass media of communication (television, radio, pressure advertising, cinema, publications and the like), and what was generally described as the "excessive enticements of modern life." Also, participants referred to the effect in many countries of the break-up of patterns of family and religious life, and of the stresses and strains inherent in the transition to a new and mechanized civilization. In a time perspective, however, the problems of youth are not new: only the forms in which they manifest themselves are different. Mankind has always lived in an age of transition, and the age of adolescence has been perceived as an age of rebellion.

6. Particularly in the developing countries, it is vitally important to ensure that the restlessness and rebelliousness of youth against traditional controls and legal restraints are constructively channelled. Young adults in these countries are expected not only to participate actively in national development but also to assume leadership. They are regarded as the main instruments as well as the main beneficiaries of national developmental programs; their dual role thus deserves and demands special attention. National development plans should therefore be prepared with a view not only to preparing the young adult for working life and fuller participation in national development, but also to incorporating measures designed to counteract the criminogenic influences surrounding youth. The attainment of such objectives can be greatly facilitated by both comprehensive planning at the national level and by proper co-ordination of the work of various agencies engaged in youth programs. In this connection, reference was made to the existence in some countries of governmental ministries and agencies set up specifically for the youth.

7. It was emphasized that crime prevention could be made more effective if more challenging work opportunities were available for young people and if they were more closely involved in the planning and directing of such work. "Youth responds to youth," and at least in one country, Israel, it was reported that very satisfying results were obtained by inducing the youth themselves to initiate and carry out work with young delinquents.

8. Although crime cannot be ascribed to any class or any race, there is abundant evidence that much of it occurs in the poorer parts of the great urban complexes, where bad housing, poor schooling and spells of unemployment ultimately result in creating an army of the under-privileged. It was felt that insufficient attention was paid to the impact on the school leaver of his first job. The apprehension and eagerness with which he begins are too often followed by boredom. The experience in the Byelorussian SSR with community care for the young worker was felt to provide a means for preventing that boredom from leading to delinquency. Induction schemes in industry should be encouraged.

9. The traditional institutional approach to the treatment of the young adult offender was consistently and strongly criticized, and emphasis was placed on devising methods which could resolve the young adults' delinquency problems within the community. Such efforts, of course, called for the closest cooperation between government and private agencies, and for the integration of case and group work within the community framework.

10. Judging from the report of many speakers, the use of probation as a substitute for institutionalization is increasing, and experiments were reported which indicated that intensive supervision can succeed even with repeated offenders, without recourse to institutionalization. New and increased uses were reported of group methods and of controlled living in hostels, half-way houses and the like, as adjuncts to probation.

11. In connection with the application of probation to young offenders, it was strongly emphasized that much greater use should be made of the services of volunteers in supervising probationers. It was pointed out that probation officers were in exiguous supply almost everywhere and that, even where they were available, they were required to devote so much time to routine administrative work that their supervisory and counselling time inevitably became minimal.

12. Although non-institutional treatment should be given preference, institutional treatment, with its attendant deprivation of liberty, is sometimes necessary for certain types of young offenders. Several types of short institutional treatment were described, such as short-term detention in special institutions for periods of between six to eight weeks, week-end detention and short-term arrest for periods not exceeding six days.

13. Longer institutional treatment in other types of institutions varied from nine months to three years in duration.

14. Whatever the type of institution, and whatever the length of the period of detention within it, it was felt to be essential that the institutional programs should be educative and not punitive. The young inmates should be kept fully occupied with programs of study, physical education, work training, group discussion and the like. Such programs should, additionally, be attuned to local needs and cultural patterns. Institutions and their programs are not to be transplanted from one culture to another; each culture has to evolve its own form of treatment.

15. Vocational and educational training programs in the institution should take account of prevailing conditions relating to employment, as well as the offender's own occupational interests, in order to meet the needs of post-release life. In countries where this was necessary, attention should be given to ways and means of cooperating with the different labor organizations.

16. The point was made that there was always a risk that work training programs within youth institutions might stagnate and become anachronistic in the context of rapid technological development outside. Young adults in institutions have to be trained for employment in freedom; instruction in outmoded skills and crafts adds to the disadvantages faced by these young people after their release to the community and this makes them all the more prone to recidivism.

17. It was urged, also that long term institutional treatment should preferably be followed by a mandatory period of after-care. The success rates obtained in countries which had made provision for such mandatory after-care seemed to support this contention. It was stressed, however, that the period of after-care should not be excessively prolonged, because it tended to yield diminishing returns after a certain point. Experience seemed to indicate a maximum of two years.

18. Poland, Spain and New Zealand, amongst others, described different kinds of treatment. Further the group probation experiment in the District of Columbia in the United States was contrasted with the Highfields program and the forestry groups in New Jersey, where work and group counselling were combined. Pleas were made for active cooperation between prison chaplains and psychiatrists, and for the training of administrators in the uses and application of research. In one country, unofficial prison visitors played an important role in preserving contact with the larger community.

19. Towards the end of the discussion, attention centred on the role of the family and the part it could play in preventive and treatment programs for young adults. Marriage guidance could help towards better family life. These techniques were also effective for persons in institutions. Families could also be mobolized to open their homes to the offender. This individual approach was felt to be in accordance with the retreat from institutionalism which characterized the entire discussions; it emphasized the essential humanity of the offender. In the long run, whether in court, under probation, or even, if necessary, in some institution, the offender will still need understanding friendship, and must be regarded not as a case but as a man.

20. The need for research was a recurrent theme in the deliberations of the Section. Since criminological research is hampered by imprecision in conceptualization and methodology, efforts must be made with the help of control groups to isolate variables, to identify prime factors and, by the exchange of knowledge between one country and another, to enlarge understanding of the turbulent adolescent and his group.

21. Research in crime prevention and treatment still has far to go before the findings are conclusive enough to justify action based upon them; and there are also many areas in which little or no research has been done. Practitioners and researchers must work more closely together as members of a team in order to facilitate communication. There is a place for both small and large-scale research, and the decision as to which kind of research should be favored should generally be left to a competent team rather than to individuals.

22. So far, much research has been done with reference to the role of the family in delinquency prevention. There is a need for increased research into the fields of other socializing agencies, notably the school, work and leisure environment. In particular, research on the capacity of teachers, youth leaders and employers for attitude changes needs to be investigated.

23. There is also a need for increased research into the efficacy of small group techniques as currently applied in youth and other correctional institutions, at schools, and the like. If group-work brings about a relatively rapid change in attitude, then such work needs to be applied increasingly as preventive agent.

24. Research on the possible harmful effects of preventive programs as well as their possible good effects should not be neglected. Many countries have initiated so called preventive programs, aimed at both the general mass of young adults and also at the seemingly more recalcitrant groups within them which appeared to pose a threat to the security of the community. It is necessary to try and ascertain whether these programs create more problems than they apparently solve; whether they in fact reach the rebellious groups at which they are specifically aimed; and, if these programs do reach the target groups, whether they tend to identify and therefore incriminate these groups.

25. Research on special treatment measures for young adult offenders seems to be closely related to typology-personality research based on analysis of various factors. Some of these factors, which dominate differently at different times in various kinds of people, are physiological and environmental factors as well as psycho-social factors, degrees of neuroticism, degrees of maturity and the like. After further validated research, the next step will be to relate these factors to different types of crime and to various types of treatment regimes.

26. Complex analytical research, linked with typology and different types of crime and treatment regimes, should form only one end of the research continuum. The other end is, of necessity, a concern with a microscopic approach to study how young adults are motivated under different conditions; how they generate anxiety and aggression; how they have different learning and perceptual difficulties at different times of their lives; and how these difficulties can be overcome.

27. Research, however thorough, would nevertheless find little application in day-to-day programs for young adults unless its findings were incorporated in executive and management training programs. Those responsible for the critical decisions as to whether or not research findings are to be applied, must be made aware of the importance of such research to the success of their operational programs, and of techniques of applying this research in actual practice.

SPECIAL GENERAL MEETING ON RESEARCH

RAPPORTEUR: Mr. Pedro P. Solis

1. There is a growing awareness in an encouraging number of countries of the importance of scientific research into the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders and the need to encourage the further development of this trend. Progress in the understanding of ourselves and our behaviour is lagging behind our understanding and control of the physical universe; the phonemenon of crime persists in every society and appears to increase the more complex society becomes. Intuition or common sense will no longer serve as adequate means for the solution of these problems. Experience has to be organized and it is only by the application of scientific methods of study, i.e., by the use of the logic and methods of investigation common to all empirical science, that we may hope to find solutions. Account must be taken of whatever knowledge scientific enquiry can yield, however imperfect it may be.

2. Criminological research will have to embrace not only social conditions, the characteristics of persons upon whom these conditions have a criminogenic effect and the inter-connexion between these factors, but also the impact of the entire system of dealing with offenders from their apprehension and adjudication to the application to them of whatever measures of punishment or treatment may be decreed by judicial and administrative authorities.

3. Despite increasingly sophisticated studies, progress in the control of crime has been slow. There are various reasons for this - including a reluctance to proceed by experimental methods which our social conscience would reject and the crudeness of existing instruments for measuring the effectiveness of preventive action. There is a need for more sensitive measuring devices than can be provided by traditional criminal statistics. Until relatively recently, most correctional agencies have tended to neglect or avoid the evaluative studies which would enable them to increase their efficiency - perhaps because of a certain distrust of academic research and perhaps because of the anxieties inherent in attempts to assess their achievements and failures. A new attitude towards scientific research is now beginning to manifest itself in correctional agencies in several countries. Some agencies are beginning to regard research into the policies and methods of dealing with offenders as a necessary administrative tool, and they are losing their fear of acknowledging openly the failure or uselessness of their treatment as applied to this or that type of offender.

4. However, a great deal remains to be worked out in practice as regards the organization of research in order to evolve the most efficient pattern of collaboration between official agencies and research centers or institutions. One such pattern would be for research to be done by competent researchers, attached to university centers or institutes, who are given access to data available in correctional agencies, who are called upon to assist such agencies in setting up rigorous experiments in treatment and who are given a free hand in evaluating the results. As a general principle, it is desirable that criminological research whether centered in a university or elsewhere, should have considerable independence. The organization of research must take account of the need to bring together both users and producers of research and must ensure that the latter is carried out on an interdisciplinary basis.

5. It is acknowledged that criminological research carried out by penal administrations themselves is of necessity limited in scope, because the inmates of institutions constitute only a small proportion of the offenders in society and not a representative sample of the criminal population as a whole. The research of penal and other social agencies will naturally be concentrated on problems of direct concern for the work of such agencies, and these enquiries will have to be supplemented and co-ordinated with those of national and university research centers in order to amass complete data on crime and its treatment over a whole country.

6. An effective system of communication is essential if research is to be conducted economically, in a co-ordinated fashion without wasteful overlap or duplication, and if it is to have a maximum usefulness for penal policy and practice. This is particularly true at a time when research resources are still limited in most countries. Many of the tools of modern research are relatively expensive and satisfactory economies can be achieved by pooling certain resources and sharing equipment with other research groups in the social or economic field.

7. Clearing houses will be required to ensure a regular exchange of information between research centers on completed, current and proposed research. Communication of this kind at the international level will involve special problems of finance, language and the working out of accepted common standards and bases of comparison.

8. The results of research will also have to be communicated from research centers to interested social agencies, and appropriate machinery or channels of communication will have to be set up to enable administrators, judges and others concerned with offenders to work out together the practical implications of research findings.

9. It should also be stressed that criminological research as well as treatment should be organized and controlled in such a way as to preserve human rights and principles of individual justice. Such ethical considerations set limits to the extent to which ideal research designs can be applied in the field of social action directed towards the control and elimination of crime.

10. Ideally, it is desirable to strive for the closest possible approximation to controlled experiment which can be achieved. This requires conditions where a larger pool of persons is eligible and suitable for a particular kind of treatment than can be given this service and where the allocation of cases to "treatment" or "control" groups is arranged by methods which have at least some basis in randomization. These ideal conditions may be difficult to achieve, and it may frequently be necessary to resort to ex post facto designs (e.g., a comparison of results obtained before and after the introduction of a new treatment method) or to make use of such other, cruder comparative methods as may be available.

11. Follow-up studies of single treatments have obvious limitations. For the most part, they provide information about those persons for whom a treatment is unsuccessful but not for whom it is successful, and indicate little of what might have been achieved if other treatment methods had been used on the same types of offenders. The future lies with comparative studies of the relative effectiveness of different types of treatment for different types of offenders. Such studies of the subsequent criminality of groups of offenders dealt with by different treatment methods or by different social agencies will require techniques for categorizing offenders in ways that are relevant to different treatment alternatives and to the various components of these treatment processes, as well as the subsequent relating of this information to future criminality. Hence the importance of typological research on offenders and the intensive study of the content or process of treatment in order to identify precisely what elements of treatment are making an effective impact on what kinds of offenders.

12. The concept of the treatment process has to be broadened to include the whole range of successive stages of judicial and social processes. The effects of various procedures can and must be subjected to empirical investigation. For example, the publication or not of the names of offenders should be investigated specifically in relation to subsequent criminality. Similarly, the practice as regards bail provides a further example of a procedure which still has to be studied, even at the simplest level, in order to determine not only the immediate effect of variations in practice but also the longer-term effects of such variations on the subsequent careers of offenders. Further, improvements in penal policy will also depend on increasing our understanding of the sociological and psychological factors underlying judicial decision-making.

13. It is necessary to emphasize that basic descriptive studies are still required even in countries where research has developed some technical sophistication. In most countries, criminological research is relatively new and knowledge is still elementary. Many assumptions underlying institutionalized procedures still remain to be tested - e.g., that pre-sentence enquiries are valuable in all cases, irrespective of the kind of information that is required and actually used by courts in reaching decisions about the best disposal of offenders. Again, reference is constantly made to "public opinion," unsupported by relevant evidence which could be provided by systematic surveys.

14. As regards the methodology of research, various points still require emphasis. The official records of offenders must be improved if they are to be of any value for research. This will require co-operation between research organizations and social agencies which compile data for their own record purposes. More than this, the collection of adequate research data will need to be planned in terms of the precise purposes and designs of research investigations. In particular, where treatment innovations are being introduced, evaluative research should be built-in from the beginning, research workers being involved in the initial planning and not merely brought in later in a passive role.

15. It has to be recognized also that research results will seldom be definitive; they will have a limited life, if only because conditions affecting crime will change and treatment methods or their application will alter in various ways. Predictive research techniques, in particular, will require to be modified continuously and kept up to date. There is a certain danger that the findings of limited or early studies will be interpreted without due qualification, accepted as conclusive and applied uncritically by administrators and policy-makers. Such pilot studies will be no more than suggestive in their implications for action and will require to be repeated or extended if a firm basis for policy decisions is to be provided.

16. Research has tended to concentrate on the effects of treatment on individual offenders and to pay insufficient attention to wider considerations such as general deterrence or the protection of society. Research into institutional treatment may have to examine more closely such questions as the appropriatness of penal methods for the rehabilitation of offenders and identify more clearly those types of individuals who must be dealt with in this way because of the threat which they present to society.

17. Treatment research has perhaps tended up till now to focus attention on crime and criminals, and to pay insufficient regard to the effects on the offender of systems of prevention and control, judicial procedures, the roles of different professions and types of personnel engaged in the treatment process. There are signs that greater attention will be paid in future to how the "response of society" affects its levels of crime.

18. Criteria for assessing the effectiveness of preventive and treatment measures have tended to be unduly restricted. More sensitive and diversified indices of recidivism will be required in future. Multiple criteria will have to be evolved, the traditional statistics of re-conviction being supplemented by information on social and personal adjustment, on subsequent work record and so on. Even such information will have to be checked further by reference to the extent to which criminal behaviour has been replaced by other forms of social deviance or mental illness. While the main focus of attention for criminological research is criminality as defined by the law, a deeper understanding of crime will be achieved by operating within the wider context of deviant social behaviour generally.

19. As far as the developing countries are concerned, it is necessary to underline the need for basic information of the most rudimentary kinds. The priority here is for the routine collection of essential data and for research reduced to its simplest terms, the keeping of systematic records and simple case studies, even if these were more subjective than might be desirable. The discipline of keeping complete records is in itself a useful contribution to the training of those engaged in work with offenders.

20. While the developing countries might require considerable assistance from outside in introducing programs of research, this process would not be all one way. It is important that opportunities for studying conditions of rapid social change should not be lost, and it is necessary to recognize that many developing countries have rich cultural traditions, balanced social structures and social controls which are still relatively effective in preventing crime. Some of these might well have relevance for the reduction of crime in more developed countries. Great opportunities are present within such simpler and more flexible social systems for conducting experiments in community action to prevent crime and great contributions can be made in this way to criminological theory by clarifying and extending our concepts of social forces and culture in relation to crime.

21. To a greater or lesser extent in different countries, action research into problems of delinquency has to concern itself with a broad range of social problems. In some countries it has been easier to demonstrate that an interdisciplinary team, working at the level of the family and concentrating on social pathology and mental health, has made a greater impact in terms of reduced infant mortality, increased community participation in local affairs, improved group activities for young people and the treatment of alcoholism than in terms of reduced delinquent or deviant behavior as such. Where delinquency is inseparable from the problems of children who are homeless, abondoned, living in extreme poverty or without stable discipline or support, the main tasks of criminological research may be those of identifying the obstacles to effective socialization or successful treatment and rehabilitation and of systematically exploring the effectiveness of possible ways of counteracting such criminogenic factors - by supporting the role of the mother in the family, strengthening the links between the school and the family, stimulating community responsibility and so on. At certain stages of social development it may be necessary to give prior attention to such situations, including the purely material environment, rather than to make a direct approach to the understanding and control of delinquency as the presenting problem or symptom.

22. While it has to be recognized that certain forms of criminological theory are not equally acceptable or congenial for countries with different kinds of social systems and political organization, nevertheless it is accepted that certain basic principles of social research methodology exist which can be applied universally to the study of social problems. The team approach to criminological research, for example, is being employed successfully in countries with widely differing social philosophies.

23. The problems of criminological research were summed up by one participant as involving organization, communication and integration with policy and practice, methodology and techniques, and strategies. In this connection, it is clear that priorities will necessarily vary to some extent from country to country, depending on the state of their development, their resources of finance, trained personnel and accumulated knowledge.

24. There is general agreement that criminological research is relatively undeveloped as a scientific pursuit. It would be unreasonable to expect rapid or complete answers to the complex problems with which it is concerned. Research is not a panacea, a substitute for action or an excuse for delaying action which must be pushed ahead on the basis of the best evidence available at any one time. Without systematic research, progress in tackling the problems of crime will be retarded; without the active interest, support and involvement of society, and of its policymakers, administrators and practitioners, criminological research will be sterile.

Desegregated Cells Cited In Stabbings

'Unrest Rampant' At Federal Prison; FBI Starts Probe

By WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS

Three U.S. Penitentiary convicts who were stabbed in their living quarters about a week ago were in a six-man cell that was being integrated, it was learned Wednesday.

A federal source told The Atlanta Journal "unrest is rampant" at the prison. He said integration is disturbing many of the 2,200 prisoners at the institution.

Warden Olin Blackwell said six-man cells were being integrated at the time of the stabbing of the three Negro inmates, but he "couldn't say" if their cell was involved.

He acknowledged that some complaints about the new integration move had been received, but said resentment inside the penitentiary is not widespread.

Dormitories have been integrated for some time, Warden Blackwell said. The latest move to integrate the six-man cells came at the time of the stabbings.

CUT IN their living quarters were Rene J. Smith, Milton B. Prather and Iverson Williams.

Warden Blackwell said the Federal Bureau of Investigation is probing the stabbings, and he does not want to comment on their investigation.

The FBI said the incident is still being investigated and they did not wish to comment on whether the cell was integrated.

Smith, serving a four-year term for mail theft, was stabbed in the chest. He was in serious condition until this week.

Prather was cut in the side and Williams in the chest. Prather is serving a five-year term for violation of narcotics laws and Williams is on a six-year mail theft conviction.

A number of relatives of convicts here telephoned The Journal recently to report unrest behind the prison walls. One source said fights had broken out.

The 2,200 convicts recently conducted a hunger strike protesting the way food is prepared and served. The strike lasted intermittently for more than week.

Arkansas Quells 144 In Prison

By BILL SIMMONS

CUMMINS PRISON FARM, Ark. (AP)—State police used tear gas and fired shots into the air to break up a melee among trusties and striking convicts Monday, an aide to Gov. Orval Faubus said.

All but one of the 144 strikers, who refused Friday to return to work in the prison farm fields, went back to the job after 10 of them were punished with a controversial whip-like leather strap, the aide said.

BREAD AND WATER

The exception was punished with the strap, placed in an isolated cell and put on a diet of bread and water.

The report came from Clarence Thornbrough, executive assistant to Faubus, after he had talked with Prison Supt. O.E. Bishop, who could not be reached.

Newsmen were turned away at the prison gate.

Thornbrough said that when it was time for the convicts to go into the fields Monday, the strikers continued their sit-down.

ENCOURAGE RETURN

Trusties were sent in to encourage a return to work and were attacked by the strikers, he said.

State police—sent to the prison for special guard duty—lobbed tear gas shells among the scuffling convicts and fired shots into the air.

That ended the fighting with injuries limited to a few skinned knuckles, Thornbrough said.

NEGROES LED AWAY

Then 10 convicts—all Negroes—were led, one by one, away from the other strikers. Each was punished with the strap, a five-foot long strip of leather fastened to a wooden handle.

Thornbrough said 143 strikers—102 Negroes and 41 whites—at this point returned to the fields. One striker, a white man, still refused to work, he said.

The strike started while Faubus was touring nearby Tucker Prison Farm, where all the hired personnel were fired by Faubus after a state police probe last week.

The Shylock

In Our Time

Adult education is a necessary part of the crisis in race relations. (Young Americans have a better understanding.)

Medicare and the hospitals offer the latest evidence of the need for informed adults. Legislation has been enacted to end inequities in commonly held citizenship rights. It was voted by the Congress — the representatives of all the people. It was not a White House act nor one by courts. It was an act by Congress.

As the July 1 date of Medicare's official beginning neared, most of the hospitals lagging in acceptance were in the Southern states. A substantial number had complied. But a check showed, ironically, that many of those which were resisting, or trying to effect compliance without really complying, were Protestant church - directed or church - related hospitals. Their private reason was that they did not want to be confronted with the problems they feared would follow accepting colored persons.

Letters to Editors

A number of letters to editors, criticizing this sort of Christianity, contained a paraphrase of Shylock's famous reply to Salar in Act Three, Scene One, of "The Merchant of Venice." Old Shylock, a sterotype of his environment in the ghetto of ancient Venice, reflected the angers and tortured personality of that ghetto environment. The paraphrase substituted the word Negro for Jew: "Hath not a Negro eyes? Hath not a Negro hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions, fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as the (white) Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us do we not die? If you wrong us, shall we not

If we are like you in the rest, we will resemble you in that . . ."

It is, admittedly, an emotional paraphrase since the original came from a highly harassed and persecuted Shylock. But the essence of the paraphrase is valid.

The Congress of this country has enacted laws reaffirming the right to vote and to use public accommodations and barring discrimination in employment and education. These are rights commonly held since the enactment of the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments about 100 years ago. It surely is not a thoughtful white citizen who would insist now that this simple and equal sharing of the thing we all hold most precious — our citizenship — should be made a matter of gradualism. Gradual granting of citizenship, held commonly, is an open admission of guilt.

Adult Education

Adult education teaches us (if Christianity does not), that continued denial of citizenship rights of the opportunity to have an equal chance to be cared for when sick or in need of surgery and the right to go to schools as good as the system provides is a wrong and dangerous thing. To argue a program of gradualism after a century of denial is, first, an admission of guilt. It causes young Negro leaders to oppose older and wiser leaders of their own race who know that the anti-white and black nationalism policies provoke the worst sort of intolerance and violence in both.

Adult education requires adult Americans to comprehend that for the average Negro the courthouse at the county seat, the sheriff, deputies and juries have not been a symbol of safety or justice. The schools have not been adequate. The right to vote has been denied or made difficult.

These are our three most treasured national institutions—justice, education and the right to vote. Surely it is clear we should now make them so for some 20 million Americans who have seen these institutions through other eyes.

OWNER SAYS RIGHTS ACT DOESN'T APPLY

Downtown Cafeteria Bars 3 Negroes

By PHIL GAILEY

Three Negroes who sought service in the Healey Building Cafeteria Wednesday were physically barred by the cafeteria's owner who told them he does not believe the 1964 Civil Rights Act applies to his business.

An FBI spokesman said later in the afternoon that a complaint has been filed with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and that an investigation is under way to see if the Civil Rights Act has been violated.

D. M. Harris, the cafeteria's owner, said he will abide with a court order to integrate his cafeteria if such an order should come.

The three Negroes were identified as J. Otis Cochran Jr., Johnny Moore and Doris Reed. Cochran said they were all connected with the Vine City Council, a slum-area organization of which Cochran is chairman.

There was no violence reported.

Cochran, who along with the two Negroes and two white persons stood in line for almost two hours waiting to be served, told newsmen he plans to seek legal advice and assistance from both the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Detective J. R. Shattles said Harris told him he did not feel his business came under the civil rights act because most of his customers worked in the Healey Building and that he did not advertise for outside trade.

Shattles told Harris and Cochran that the city had nothing to do with who was to be served in the cafeteria and advised them to take the matter to the courts.

Cochran, chairman of the Vine City Council, said he asked Harris if he and his friends were being denied service because they were Negroes.

"Harris said, 'Yes,' " Cochran said.

Harris said he did not make such a statement. He said again that he would give his reasons in court.

"I'll give my reasons for denying them service in court," Harris said.

Cochran told police that he and a friend were on their way to meet some friends when they wandered into the Healey Building Cafeteria — located in the lobby of the Healey Building — by chance.

"When we try to get in line this man (Harris) runs out and jumps in front of us," Cochran said.

Cochran said he left the cafeteria to seek some advice from sources he would not disclose and returned with some friends, another Negro and two white persons. The group stood in line for almost two hours waiting to be served.

One of the Negroes bought two cups of coffee from the snack bar in the front of the cafeteria while Harris blocked the other Negroes from the cafeteria line.

Cochran said he would be back Thursday to seek service in the cafeteria and expects to be joined by others.

The cafeteria's owner said he would refuse them if they come back.

Harris said this was the first attempt by Negroes to eat in his place.

This would be the first test of the 1964 Civil Rights Act in Atlanta since Lester Maddox lost his case to keep his cafeteria segregated.

Weir Says Housing Is Justified

Atlanta Water Works chief Paul Weir said Wednesday that the 32 employes in his department who live in rent-free, city-owned houses get this bonus so they can be on tap 24 hours a day for emergencies.

It was revealed Tuesday that 55 employes in five city departments reside in city-owned dwellings — without paying rent although rent is required by the city code.

Weir took the position that emergencies arise "very frequently" in his department and that it is therefore desirable for selected personnel to be housed in rent-free quarters on property acquired by the city for the water works.

Weir took exception to reports that his department built a new house last year on Benwell Road without authorization, using money appropriated to "maintenance and repair" within the department.

Weir maintained the construction had received "the full authorization of the aldermanic water committee."

City Comptroller Charles Davis has said that his staff has not been able to uncover any resolution or ordinance or record of authorization having been tendered for the Benwell Road project.

Baptist Group Burns Mortgage

By CLAUDE GEORGE SR.

The General Missionary Baptist Convention of Georgia recently paid off the mortgage on its headquarters in Atlanta and celebrated the event with a "mortgage burning" ceremony.

Dr. L. M. Terrill, president, said that the mortgage was paid off six years early and that this is the first time the convention has ever owned property in Atlanta.

The convention will now undertake to build a new headquarters which it hopes to complete in time for its centennial celebration in 1970, Dr. Terrill said.

The session of the convention is meeting in Macon Wednesday and Thursday at which time it will take up the matter of a new headquarters building.

Barrier Dropped, Negroes Get Food

By WALKER LUNDY

About 20 Negroes were served lunch Thursday in a Healey Building cafeteria, 24 hours after three had been refused service.

Cafeteria manager D. M. Harris answered, "No comment, no comment," when asked why he had changed his mind.

He said he would fight the matter in court, not in his restaurant.

Among those eating in the cafeteria were J. Otis Cochran, one of the three refused service Wednesday and John Lewis, controversial leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

Mr. Harris asked newsmen to leave the restaurant and the crowd of about 10 of them and about 50 white onlookers stood in the lobby and watched the Negroes go through the cafeteria line peacefully.

THE FBI had already begun an investigation of the cafeteria incident to determine if the civil rights of the three Negroes were violated when they were refused service.

The chief of the Atlanta FBI office, Joseph Ponder, said the examination of the matter would take "a few days." He said a report will be made to the Justice Department in Washington, which will decide whether legal action is necessary.

The incident occured at lunchtime Wednesday when two Negro men and one Negro woman —all members of the Vine City Council—attempted to enter the cafeteria line.

Mr. D. M. Harris blocked their entrance but the Negroes remained for more than an hour before leaving. One of them, Mr. Cochran, chairman of the Vine City group, said then that he would register a complaint with the FBI. Later in the afternoon, the bureau announced he had.

MR. HARRIS SAID the Civil Rights Act of 1964 does not apply to his cafeteria and that was why he did not serve the Negroes.

"I have no signs asking people to come in, there is no public street entrance and the major portion of our food is raised in Georgia," he said.

In an almost identical case shortly after the Civil Rights Act was passed, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a Birmingham restaurant came under the law's influence because its food products had been transported across state lines.

Mr. Cochran and the other two Negroes, Johnny Moore and Doris Reed, said they telephoned Atlanta police after Mr. Harris refused them service.

Police said there was no violence during the incident. Detective J. R. Shattles said he told Mr. Harris that the manager probably violated the Civl Rights Act.

Mr. Harris said he would wait for a court ruling before complying with the act.

Boom Pulls Blacks to Cities To Work; Outlook Is Dim For Decentralizing Industry

Economics and the Color Line

By PAUL LANCASTER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa—David M. is a short, round-faced 34-year-old African who earns his living by serving tea to white men in the offices of a large company here. He wears a threadbare brown suit jacket and mismatched trousers, makes only $14 a week, and must be able to produce at any time, on demand of the police, a brown-covered pass book showing he is allowed in Johannesburg.

Still his life isn't entirely bleak. He grew up in a tin-roofed hovel in a now-vanished black slum of Johannesburg; today he owns a tiny four-room brick house (not the land, because the law forbids that) in Soweto, a vast government-built African housing development outside the city. Moreover, David M., who attended school to a point equal to seventh grade in the U.S., is about to move into a better-paying job as clerk in a company storeroom.

"I'm married and I have two children," he says. "I don't want to serve tea anymore."

South African whites point with pride to the improved living conditions of Africans like David. But signs are mounting that it is precisely this sort of urbanized African who is going to frustrate the country's grand design for solving its racial problem by separating the black majority from the white minority. David and increasing numbers of his fellows are becoming inextricably bound up with the booming white South African economy, and many observers are convinced the trend is irreversible.

Assessing South Africa's "separate development" policy, a Johannesburg banker says: "From an economic point of view, it's bound to fail. I think a lot of Nationalists (the ruling party) know this, too, but they can't turn back now."

Carving Up a Country

The Nationalists insist they know nothing of the kind. They maintain that with determined effort the plan of Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd's government to carve the country into white and nonwhite areas can be made to work. And they confidently predict—with concurrence from their critics—that the parliamentary election March 30 will demonstrate conclusively that white South Africans back the government more strongly than ever.

An election victory won't dispose of the economic obstacles to separate development, say those South Africans who doubt the plan's feasibility. But they usually add that they can offer no easy alternative course. Many are as firmly set as government supporters against rapid extension of political rights to nonwhites, though some do talk of a distant day when nonwhites' economic ad-

But they usually add that they can offer no easy alternative course. Many are as firmly set as government supporters against rapid extension of political rights to nonwhites, though some do talk of a distant day when nonwhites' economic advancement might lead to advancement in other areas of South African life.

Whatever the future of race relations here, the course they take is of deep concern far beyond the borders of South Africa. Though Rhodesia's racial situation dominates the headlines now, the confrontation there is on a far smaller scale than that in South Africa, and in the long run it is probably far less significant. What happens here in coming years may go a long way toward determining whether black-white tensions diminish or intensify in all of Africa. It may also determine whether this bustling industrial nation—which boasts it produces three times as much steel and twice as much electricity as the rest of Africa combined—can ever get on well enough with the rest of the continent to fill its natural role as a supplier of manufactured goods, a role now largely ruled out by other African nations' embargoes against its products.

Americans' Stake

The fact that South Africa accounts for more than 70% of the Free World's gold production also contributes to international concern about its future. And from the point of view of the defenses of the non-Communist world, how South Africa resolves its racial problems may determine its reliability as a pro-West foothold on the African continent. Strictly from the point of view of U.S. interests, racial developments in South Africa may well bear on the long-term safety of the $500 million worth of direct American invesment here.

South Africa, roughly twice the size of Texas, has a population of 17.8 million. Of these, 19% are white and 69% are Africans, or "Bantu," as they are known in South Africa. About 9% are mixed bloods, called "coloreds," and the remaining 3% are Asiatics, mainly Indians.

The whites are on top in every way. Nonwhites have no vote and no voice in the South African government, except for a limited system whereby some of the coloreds are represented in parliament by whites. David M., who falls at the bottom of the color scale, calls white men "baas" and is referred to by them as a "boy."

Africans' movements are tightly controlled to keep those not needed in the labor force out of the cities. This is the purpose of the pass books. Men coming to cities to work from outlying areas must often leave wives and families behind.

African Wages

Modest homes of white factory workers have a room at the back for a live-in maid, and middle-income families frequently have a garden "boy" as well. An African maid in Johannesburg is paid about $6 a week, plus food and lodging. Law and custom sharply circumscribe the jobs nonwhites can do, and nonwhites generally have been restricted to the less skilled jobs. Though Africans' pay is rising, Bantu wages in manufacturing average about $600 a year—a fifth the average for whites.

Segregation appears to be limited only by the country's capacity to turn out signs reading "whites only" and "nonwhites only" or "Europeans only" and "non-Europeans only." The signs are everywhere, usually both in English and in Afrikaans, the Dutch-derived language that is the principal tongue of 60% of the white population. They will always be necessary, says Minister of Information Frank Waring, because contact between races inevitably produces "friction."

There are separate telephone booths, elevators, railroad cars and post office windows. Off-track horse-race betting centers have separate doors. At the edge of a park in downtown Johannesburg a well-dressed young African couple perches on the curb because "Europeans only" is stenciled on the benches. At Port Elizabeth, there are six categories of beaches—for whites, coloreds, Africans, Indians, Malays and Chinese.

Such manifestations of "petty apartheid," as the more trivial forms of discrimination are known, genuinely distress a sizable number of whites here. But even many of them insist that economic discrimination is unavoidable for now. The operator of a print shop in Johannesburg says he pays unskilled beginning Africans half what he pays whites. "But it's no saving. They just aren't reliable workers, and any request for anything out of the ordinary starts them grumbling. I have one area where I now employ three Africans, and I'm considering replacing them all with one white woman."

Even in the case of petty apartheid, support is by no means limited to the government or working-class whites. "We keep different kinds of people apart so one group won't be made to feel inferior by being placed in close contact with a more advanced group," explains a rising young Afrikaner businessman in Cape Town.

States Within a State

Though separate-development planners have designated specified areas as reserved for whites, coloreds and Asiatics, the program focuses mainly on the Africans. The announced aim is to create a number of separate Bantu states, called "Bantustans" or "homelands," within the borders of South Africa. These states, the government says, eventually will become autonomous, and the blacks living within their borders will govern themselves and possess full political, social and economic rights.

A total of eight Bantustans have been mapped out by the government. They occupy 13% of the country's area. The disproportion between this and the blacks' 69% share of the population is frequently criticized. The government says much of South Africa is mountainous or arid, and claims that 45% of the country's most fertile ground is located in the Bantu homelands.

The government says separate development "makes it possible for the various groups to enjoy the full privileges of a free society, each in their own area, unhampered by the strains imposed by a multiracial society." The same statement asserts that "the mixing of two such alien elements as white the tie-up to their homelands," says Dirk Richard, editor of an Afrikaans weekly owned by a company of which the Prime Minister is chairman. "We must imbue them with ethnic and nationality feeling."

Trying to Stem the Tide

The government also maintains that the growth of the African population in the cities can be halted eventually. Officials have mentioned 1978 as the year when urban Africans' ranks should hit a peak and then start to decline.

The key to reversing the flow to the cities is a vast expansion of employment opportunities in or near the African homelands. "The job is tremendously big," concedes Johannes Adendorff, general manager of Bantu Investment Corp., a government corporation that is trying to develop new businesses in the homeland areas for eventual take-over by Africans. Nevertheless, he says he is confident that "if we have sufficient time, it can be done."

The government also is prodding white industry to build plants just outside the Bantustan borders. They are manned largely by Africans who cross over each day to work. The government holds out the prospect of chea labor and offers tax and other incentives.

Pieter Rautenbach, chairman of a government economic planning council, says that since it began in 1960 the border industry program has resulted in 88 new factories and 57 expansion projects in border areas. The upshot has been the creation of a total of 42,000 new jobs for Africans in these outlying areas in five and a half years.

But Mr. Rautenbach himself says 34,800 new border jobs a year will be needed to stop the flow of African men to the cities. Another economist sets the figure at 70,000. And some "border industries" actually are so far from African homelands that workers can't commute daily, but must continue to live segregated lives in white areas.

Why Move?

Many businessmen think the incentives now offered can't lure enough industry to the outlying areas to produce any significant change in the distribution of the African population. "If industry is making a good profit here, which it is, why should it move?" asks a Johannesburg banker.

And almost no one expects much from government efforts to create industries within the homelands, where white capital is banned. In the Transkei these efforts have produced only 232 new factory jobs (in a furniture plant and a weaving mill). A meat-packing plant to open soon will employ only 50.

If the economic obstacles to separate development as now envisioned prove insurmountable, what then?

There can only be speculation. Completely new international pressures could come into play in South Africa. New calls for economic sanctions might develop, particularly if they prove effective against Rhodesia or if South Africa should refuse to abide by a forthcoming decision in the case before the International Court of Justice over South Africa's application of apartheid in the mandated territory of South-West Africa. Also, black African states, perhaps spurred on by Communists, might try to fire up Africans here.

The same statement asserts that "the mixing of two such alien elements as white and black leads to unhappy social results—racial miscegenation, moral deterioration of both, racial antipathy and clashes, and to many other forms of social evil."

Not spelled out in the statement, but obviously the heart of the matter, is the fact that the mixing of white and black in South Africa might well lead eventually to a black-ruled country. This path, says Information Minister Waring, could bring only "bloodshed and chaos."

Green Hills, Mud Huts

To visitors, the government proudly displays the Transkei, the first of the Bantustans to begin functioning. A stretch of breathtaking green hills sprinkled with thatch-roofed mud huts, women wrapped in bright orange blankets and loincloth-clad cattle herdsmen, it assumed limited self-government in 1963. The Transkei, which still is in a transition stage between white and black, has its own African parliament and ministers. Though the African politicians—who stay at boarding houses when they come to the capital city of Umtata because the hotels still admit only whites—are carefully coached by white advisers, they have on at least one occasion taken a position at odds with South African government policy.

One of the latest moves by South Africa in the Transkei was to begin rezoning as black certain areas of towns now occupied by whites. The rezoning, which is intended to lead eventually to complete takeover of the towns by Africans, means that in coming years a number of white owners of houses and businesses may have to sell out to Africans. The rezoning has been accompanied by a measure of confusion; in Umtata, the clubhouse of the white golf course has been left white for now but the fairways and greens are zoned black. "I'm sure the government had a reason," says one puzzled white resident.

Despite developments in the Transkei, some people remain skeptical that the Nationalist government will ever let the Bantustans become fully independent. Others say unsatisfactory land allocations for some of the Bantustans make it unlikely they could ever become true states. Some are collections of dots of territory scattered through white areas rather than contiguous areas like the Transkei.

Beside the Point?

Most white South Africans, however, including severe critics of the government, seem to feel there is nothing to lose in trying to develop the Bantustans as fully as possible. At the least, it's argued, such efforts should result in more rights and better living for blacks in the areas. But a substantial number of white South Africans, along with some overseas observers, also assert that when it comes to solving the country's long-term racial problem, the Bantustans are largely beside the point.

The reason: Close to 60% of South Africa's blacks live not in the rural areas that have been marked off as Bantustans but in white urban, farming and mining areas—and the number is rising rapidly. Some 2.3 million blacks lived in South African cities in 1951; by 1960, the total was 3.2 million. Urban Africans outnumber urban whites.

The government has some answers to this. It says that Africans will have full political rights in their tribal homelands even if they live outside them. An African who lives and works in Johannesburg but who traces his origins to the Transkei theoretically will be compensated for his rigidly segregated life here by the knowledge that he possesses rights, including the vote, several hundred miles away in the Transkei.

Even some ardent Nationalists concede it may take a bit of doing to put this idea across to some urbanized blacks. "We have to convince these people of the meaning of

Also, black African states, perhaps spurred on by Communists, might try to fire up Africans here.

Violence Seems Unlikely

Most students of South Africa are convinced, however, that the explosions of violence periodically predicted for the country aren't going to happen in the foreseeable future. The police have things firmly in hand, with any potential troublemakers jailed, restricted or driven out of the country. And South Africa is in a powerful position to resist sanctions if only because of its gold.

Within South Africa there clearly are some whites who would prefer failure for the Bantustan program—or any other scheme carrying the slightest chance of elevating nonwhites. They are thoroughgoing white supremacists who want blacks around forever as cheap labor. The Nationalist Party contains a sizable group that feels Mr. Verwoerd spends too much money to develop the Bantustans and to educate Africans.

Still, steady economic advancement for nonwhites seems inevitable. Though official rules may state that nonwhites can't hold certain jobs, there is a shortage of white labor here and employers increasingly must fill supposedly white slots with nonwhites. Last year new rules for the auto industry listed jobs to be restricted to whites. But whites weren't available and exemptions were granted leaving things about as they were before.

But will rising wages and an expanding economic role for nonwhites translate into political power and a lowering of color bars? Many South Africans are reluctant even to speculate.

Some cannot conceive of change as long as the Nationalists remain in charge. They also note that the principal opposition party, the United Party, which draws its support mainly from English-speaking whites, differs little in its outlook on racial matters from the Afrikaner-dominated Nationalist Party.

Such speculation also inevitably raises the question of rule by the African majority. And most whites here, including those who doubt the workability of the government's present program, refuse to contemplate such a possibility.

Seeking Political Power

But a handful of white South Africans regard it as a certainty that nonwhites are going to seek more political and social rights some day and that the only end to which this can lead, probably sometime in the distant future, is a dominant political role for Africans.

Some remain hopeful such a change could come smoothly. "If the African states and the UN would stop breathing down our necks, it could come out all right," says a Johannesburg businessman of English descent. "But we need time to bring the Africans along slowly and to develop an educated African middle class."

Others doubt a completely peaceful transition is possible. Mrs. Helen Suzman, the lone representative in parliament of the Progressive Party, which favors extending the vote now to "qualified" persons of all races, foresees an uneasy period during what she regards as an inevitable transition to nonwhite majority rule.

"I don't want to say there will be violence," she says. "But when change comes it will be change which is resisted."

South African Exile To Talk on Racism Here

RACISM AC 4/4/66

Robert Resha, South African Nationalist leader in exile, will speak on "The Struggle Against Racism in South Africa" at a meeting here Thursday at 8 p.m.

The South African leader is touring the United States and parts of Canada to raise funds and spread information about South African "apartheid."

FREEDOM MOVEMENT

Resha was chosen by the South African Freedom Movement to be its exiled representative to maintain contact with friendly African independent governments.

Raised in the slums of "black" Johannesburg, the Negro leader helped organize the Congress of People in 1955, the largest multi-racial gathering ever held in South Africa. The congress adopted a "Freedom Charter," a declaration of independence based on the United Nations Charter. A year later Resha was one of 156 defendants brought to court in a treason trial that lasted four years and ended in dismissal or acquittal for all the accused.

Resha has worked in the freedom struggle with Albert J. Lutuli, head of the now-banned African National Congress who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1960.

U.S. COMMITTEE

Resha's address here is sponsored by the American Committee on Africa. The address will be at the Quaker House, 1384 Fairview Road NE. Among sponsors of the American Committee are Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Morehouse President Benjamin E. Mayes.

Funds raised will go to the African Defense and Aid Fund to provide legal aid for South African opponents to apartheid and to provide financial aid to their families.

An Evening With Mr. Welch

Robert Welch, the grandfatherly looking founder of the John Birch Society, was in town the other night and it was like homecoming to some 800 of the faithful who gathered to hear the gospel.

Anyone familiar with Mr. Welch's writings might understandably picture him as a wild-eyed ranting and raving demagogue who would do justice to the most vociferous of the old wool-hat boys. But he is not. He does look grandfatherly and his speech is soft and pleasant to the ear.

And his followers here are not the "little old ladies in tennis shoes" you read about. The majority were young married couples, conservatively and tastefully dressed.

You look at them and you wonder. You wonder what all these nice looking people are doing here, listening to all this drivel about the civil rights movement being a "Communist-inspired" plot to establish "a Soviet Negro republic in the Southeast United States."

One also wonders whether any of these people have ever read Mr. Welch's book "The Politician." (I know that both in the book and in statements of the society there are disavowals of any connection between the two. The fact remains that Mr. Welch is the society's founder and spokesman, and his views should be important to its membership.)

Here is what Mr. Welch said about the late Gen. George C. Marshall on Page 15:

"I defy anybody, who is not actually a Communist himself, to read all the known facts about his career and not decide that since at least sometime in the 1930s George Catlett Marshall has been a conscious, deliberate, dedicated agent of the Soviet conspiracy."

Of the late Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, on Page 223:

"For many reasons and after a lot of study, I personally believe Dulles to be a Communist agent. . . ."

In Mr. Welch's first version of the book he called former President Eisenhower a Communist, but in his revised (1963) edition he deletes that specific charge and instead merely attributes many of Eisenhower's acts to prodding from "his Communist bosses."

This erstwhile author, founder of an organization described by Georgia gubernatorial candidate Lester Maddox as "best equipped to stop the Communist conspiracy," told his audience here:

"Not only is this country one vast insane asylum, but they're letting the worst patients run the place."

Sounds kind of nutty, doesn't it?

New Book to Help Impeach Warren, Birchite Says Here

RADICAL RIGHT

By DUANE RINER

The John Birch Society's lagging movement to impeach Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren will gather momentum in the coming year with publication of a new book, "High Crimes and Misdemeanors," its author prediced here Monday night.

Edward Griffin, 35, a full-time Birch Society staff coordinator, told a news conference at the Biltmore Hotel Monday's Supreme Court ruling that states can declare their properties out of bounds for civil rights marchers is just another example of the court's "double standard."

He said the court had ruled earlier that private property owners could not deny demonstrators access if the facilities came under provisions of the public accommodations section of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Asked to define his charge of "high crimes and misdemeanors," the former radio and television announcer who now lives in California said the "record shows" that the current Supreme Court justices have "undermined the forces of law and order, given aid and comfort to the enemy and destroyed the system of checks and balances" by concentrating the powers of government into the federal branch and, specifically, the presidency.

He repeated the charges in a speech three hours later.

Griffin said he could not say whether the Nov. 8 elections provided gains or losses for conservatism. He said the results merely provide a barometer of gains and losses already achieved.

The spokesman, who said the John Birch Society does not attempt to define its brand of conservatism, voiced confidence that conservatives "will make a comeback . . . when the majority of people begin to understand the wisdom of the Conservative viewpoint." This could come in the 1968 presidential election, he said.

Endorsement of political candidates is "contrary to the principles" of the John Birch Society, and the society's function is "education," Griffin explained.

He said the society is "growing rather steadily and significantly" in Georgia.

OPPOSED TO KLAN

As to the society's relationship to the Ku Klux Klan, Griffin declared that his organization is "entirely opposed" to klan principles and revokes the membership of any person found also belonging to the KKK.

Griffin said he was not sufficiently familiar with the Georgia gubernatorial race to comment on the current confusion. "The society doesn't really get happy or unhappy over the candidacy of any one man" but merely attempts to evaluate views as individuals, he said.

He summed up the society's position, as explained in founder Robert Welch's "Blue Book," as a drive for "less government and more responsibility."

Asked how the society's membership stacks up along party lines, Griffin said it probably would be about 60 per cent Republican and 40 per cent Democrat.

OTHER VIEWS

On other subjects, Griffin said:

—"I am against all federal aid since all federal aid has federal control."

—The founding fathers envisioned the federal government as only a means of representing the nation's position in the world, meaning it should be confined to military and diplomatic functions.

—The Department of Health, Education and Welfare is "strictly socialism." He defined the basic purpose of government as "to protect and not to provide."

—He approves setting of health standards, civil aeronautics control and some other regulatory functions.

—The nation has a "no win" policy in Viet Nam, a policy of "containment instead of victory."

The Red Chinese people will revolt against Mao Tse-tung if National China leader Chiang Kai-Shek is given the opportunity, with U.S. backing of fighting Communism in both North Viet Nam and Red China.

—"I'm against all foreign aid for two reasons: It's unconstitutional and we're broke."

With Griffin at the news conference was the Georgia coordinator for the John Birch Society, 25-year-old Gerald Jones, who said he was "personally delighted" over Republican Ben Blackburn's apparent victory over Democratic incumbent Rep. James A. Mackay in the Fourth District.

Jones, a native of Sanford, Fla., has been the society's Georgia coordinator for three years. He said Mackay's charge that members of the society were working to defeat him probably was true, but only "as individuals."

The society's membership, he said, includes "some of the most prominent men in DeKalb County."

The society, with an estimated 150 chapters in the state—mostly in the metropolitan Atlanta area—has been approached by a Negro group in Cobb County for details of membership, Jones said.

Jones said the chapters are confined to 15 to 25 persons each. "We find they're much better working units when they're small."

U.S. Launches Drive on Bias In Religion on Insurance

RELIGIOUS BIAS

AC 3/20/66

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON, March 19 — The federal government has launched a quiet campaign against alleged religious discrimination in insurance companies.

The air is to open executive positions to Jews and Roman Catholics, as well as to Negroes and other racial minorities, in companies where the top jobs may be reserved for Anglo-Saxon Protestants.

It is belived to be the first time the government has moved against religous discrimination under a succession of presidential orders, dating back to 1951, that call for equal employment opportunity in concerns holding federal contracts.

THE LATEST ORDER prohibits discrimination because of "race, creed, color or national origin."

The Social Security Administration is requiring of insurance companies selected to distribute medicare funds the same compliance procedures regarding creed as it is for race, color and national origin.

Involved are some of the oldest and largest insurance companies in the nation.

In the past, the government has sought to eliminate racial discrimination in all firms holding government contracts. It requires each to submit data on the racial composition of its work force.

When this discloses an apparent exclusion of racial minorities steps are taken to see that the company adopts a more open employment policy.

Until recently, no effort had been made to have companies report on the religious affiliation of their employes and in absence of complaints the government generally ignored this phase of compliance.

LAST FALL, the American Jewish Committee filed a complaint with Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz charging that some major defense contractors were discriminating, chiefly against Jews but also against Roman Catholics, in high management appointments.

The committee called on Wirtz to impose sanctions, including cancellation of federal contracts, against companies that persist in religious discrimination.

Both Wirtz and Edward C. Sylvester, director of the Office of Contract Compliance, expressed concern and indicated more would be done on behalf of both religious minorities and some of the forgotten racial minorities such as Spanish Americans.

Early this year, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare set up a special staff in the Social Security Administration to seek contract compliance from concerns that will pay doctor bills under Medicare. The staff is headed by Chester J. Gray, a veteran compliance officer on loan from the Air Force.

MEDICARE, the new health insurance program for the aged, will go into effect July 1. Forty-eight organizations in the health insurance field were chosen as intermediaries to distribute the funds, as required by law.

These include 32 Blue Shield organizations, Aetna Life Insurance Co.; Connecticut General Life nsurance Co.; John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co.; the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States; Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; Pan-American Life Insurance Co.; The Travelers Insurance Co.; the Prudential Insurance Co. of America; Na-

REPORTS, INTERNAL

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF FIELD ACTIVITIES
Southern Regional Council
Annual Meeting---November 16, 1966

Insofar as this report might deal with the personal activity of the Director of Field Activities, it is tempting to summarize by quoting one of the central characters from the Book of Job. Whenever the council of heaven was called, "Satan came also among them." Each time, in answer to the query, "Whence have you come?" Satan answered the Lord, "From going to and fro on the earth, and from walking up and down on it."

Taking advantage of opportunities during my first year to acquaint myself with the region, as well as carrying out necessary duties, has carried me twice to Arkansas, three times into Tennessee, twice to Washington, D.C., and once to Virginia. I have been four times each to North and South Carolina and thrice to Florida. I have lost the count for Alabama and Mississippi, and the air lines think I commute to Louisiana. Georgia can thank Paul Anthony and my wife for distracting me from my duties here, except for attending the annual meeting of the Georgia Council, fairly regular attendance at their executive committee meetings, and a couple of speaking engagements.

Most of these wanderings have been occasioned by some function of the state councils. As with all of the professional staff of the SRC, however, there have been responses to occasional requests and opportunities, such as attendance at the Mid-Decade Conference on Children and Youth and the White House Conference on Civil Rights; a talk on "The Nature of Prejudice" at a workshop in Mobile for the Personnel Directors of the largest Post Offices in the region; an address to the United Church Women of Huntsville and to local human relations councils in Charleston, Aiken, and Auburn; and a briefing for Y.W.C.A. executives at Lake Junaluska.

Additional travel was occasioned by special program efforts involving the field department. In the spring and early summer we cooperated with the American Friends Service Committee, the NAACP Legal Defence and Education Fund, and the several state councils in workshops on school desegregation in each of the southern states. These were held in conjunction with wider conferences sponsored by the state advisory committees to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights. Along with John Boone, Director of of SRC's Special Project on Crime and Corrections, we assisted the Fellowship of Concern and the state councils with a series of workshops on "Dual Justice in the Courts." These, too, were held in each state in the region. Mrs. Tilly will tell you more about them later in this meeting.

In the course of the year we have been called upon for other services requiring less travel, but a great deal of administrative work. We were asked to secure the names of Negro boys now in the eighth grade, a list of apt candidates from which eighteen could be selected for admission to six of the top prep schools of the South.

A more involved project has been an experiment in the distribution of paperback books among people who otherwise have had little opportunity to use and own books. We are attempting to find unorthodox means of making them available, such as bookshelves in community centers; parents groups connected with day care or Head Start programs; in connection with tutorial projects, reading rooms, and study halls; and by creating or supplementing inadequate classroom or school libraries. Under the able administration of Miss Louise Cole of our staff and with the invaluable aid of the Atlanta News Agency, we are well into the process of distributing some 40,000 paperback books in these ways.

Your field department continues to serve as the secretariat for the Southern Interagency Conference, an informal gathering, four times per year, of most of the intergroup relations agencies working in the region for the purpose of discussing current problems and prospects and mutual briefing on new programs.

Service and assistance to the state councils on human relations remains, however, the primary continuing responsibility of your Department of Field Activities--and their growth in size, strength and effectiveness our constant concern.

As you know, we have been able this year, because of increased foundation support, to triple the total of our grants-in-aid to the state councils to $150,000. In addition we are now able to invest some $50,000 per year in Rural Advancement Projects under the structures of four state councils, working in close cooperation with the National Sharecroppers Fund. Moreover, the councils are able to take advantage of incidental program funds available in connection with SRC's special projects for specific, short-term activities. Thus we are contributing between $225,000 and $250,000 to state and local council operation and program.

For the reasons mentioned by Mr. Anthony this afternoon the purpose of the expanded grant-in-aid program is to enable the state councils to grow to the point where they can be self-sustaining in their basic staffed operations. Our goal is to see this point reached by the end of 1968, with possible exceptions in the cases of the Mississippi and Louisiana Councils, which have only recently been reorganized. To this end we have constantly emphasized organized recruitment and involvement of members, organized efforts at indigenous funding, increase in size of staffs, and professional upgrading of staff--as well as concomitant development of program and services.

The response of state council leaders, both lay and professional has been gratifying and the results are notable. In addition to Rural Advancement Projects in South Carolina, Florida, Georgia and Alabama--each with a full-time director--other full-time staff professionals have been added: two in Tennessee and one each in Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. In Louisiana an office has been opened in Baton Rouge and an able Executive Director and Office Manager employed, giving that council a staff for the first time. The operations in Arkansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Florida have been stabilized with adequate salaries for executives and full-time clerical employees.

While speaking of personnel changes, we note with regret that some members of the state council family who were present at this meeting last year are missing this year. Bob Alexander and Ozell Sutton resigned from the staffs of the Houston and Arkansas Councils, respectively, to accept other positions. Nat Griswold, who has been Executive Director of the Arkansas Council from its beginning, is on a six-month leave of absence to write a book and will formally retire at the end of the year. Most sadly do we report the death, on September 19, of Mr. Oliver Holmes, personable and invaluable Assistant to the Director of the Georgia Council.

As for training and upgrading of the council staffs, it has been possible to double the number of state council staff conferences. We have brought them together five times this year, in addition to their attendance at this meeting. One time it was for an eight-day Community Leadership Development Laboratory at Emory University--a first attempt to secure formal in-service training for council staffers.

The state council presidents were brought together also for a two-day conference on June 17 and 18. This, too, was the first meeting of its kind. The presidents felt that the discussion of purposes, policy and philosophy and the sharing of problems was very helpful, and they have asked that this be made an annual affair.

Time would not permit my telling you, even if I could, of all the imaginative, creative things the state councils have been doing. But let me mention a few.

The Virginia Council has made a thorough study of the ethnic bias of that state's approved textbooks and has promoted use of multi-ethnic texts by the preparation of two excellent publications on the subject, among other ways. They are also sponsoring a significant conference on religion and race, scheduled for the last of this month.

The Georgia Council has conducted and reported a well-planned study of the state's public assistance program. Jointly with the Georgia A.C.L.U. and with the aid of the SRC staff and resources, the Georgia Council prepared an attractive, easily readable handbook titled Know Your Rights, which sets forth basic rights of persons arrested by police officers. It has received wide distribution and acclaim. The North Dekalb chapter of GCHR conducted a Voter Education Project which registered about 500 persons.

The Tennessee Council has done an effective job of securing truly representative and democratic Community Action agencies in two of the largest cities in the state. Since the addition of Mr. and Mrs. Wiersema to the staff they have begun important studies of public housing and public welfare in Tennessee. Their Knoxville chapter carried out an effective Voter Registration Project.

"Project SPEED-UP" of the South Carolina Council employed college students to tutor more than 2,000 children in 28 locations in 13 counties.

The Arkansas Council secured a grant from the Voter Education Project and conducted a registration drive in 14 counties. Well over 7,000 persons were registered to vote.

The Florida Council conducted a two-day workshop for local council leaders and, partly as a result of the ideas and resources discovered to them at that meeting, the local councils of Florida have been unusually active.

The Alabama Council, utilizing a VEP grant, did an excellent job of informing farmers in 12 counties about the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service elections and of policing the elections themselves. ASCS elections are vital because the representative chosen in them determine crop allotments for the year.

The Mississippi Council has sponsored a number of statewide conferences, including one which brought together a large number of the state's impoverished people and officials of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The Executive Director has become an effective link in communication between the white establishment and Negro leaders.

The growth of the state councils is measurable statistically. We have sought this year to limit our reckoning of membership to those whose dues are currently paid. On that basis the total membership now stands at approximately 11,500, an increase of some 23% over last year. Percentage increases ranged from five percent in Virginia, which is the largest of the councils, to ninety-five percent in Arkansas, which heretofore had been one of the smallest. The Alabama Council, which won the Mitchell Award last year, increased its membership another ten percent this year. Tennessee registers a thirteen percent increase and South Carolina a jump of twenty-three percent. The North Carolina Council shows a 57% increase. And Georgia deserves special commendation for raising its membership enrollment by 53%, although starting from a relatively large base of more than a thousand members.

At the height of their strength the state councils had this year 26 full-time professional employees, an increase of 18% over last year. Part-time and clerical staffs have increased proportionately.

The councils have raised about $120,000 from their members and friends--an increase of 20%. At the same time the total of their operating budgets has passed $400,000--a leap of more than 25%.

All of these facts are encouraging.

But we cannot be satisfied with arithmetic progress when the sustained crisis of this region grows by geometric progression. The beleaguered people of the human relations councils have been these dozen years--to a greater degree than is generally understood--the salt of the South. But conditions have been altered radically since their founding, and there are those both within and without the state councils who question the need or the possibility--or both--of their continuing. I for one am convinced that their proper role is more vital than it was in 1954 and 1955, although it needs, perhaps, to be differently conceived.

All of us are keenly aware of the radical challenge which has been thrown down by the "black power" movement and of the lightning speed of the "white backlash." Intriguing to me are the assumptions of "black power" advocates as articulated by one of their able interpreters, Mr. Julian Bond:

> ...the social system, as organized is no longer capable of solving, through normal channels, the urgent problems presented to it by history.
> ...white Americans, generally speaking, lack the will, the courage and the intelligence to voluntarily grant Negroes their civil rights and...must be forced to it by pressure.
> ...people do not discriminate for the fun of it;...the function of prejudice is to defend social, economic, political and psychological interests, and...appeals to the fair play of prejudiced people are prayers said to the wind.
> ...communities will change discriminatory patterns if they are faced with a clear-cut choice between bias and another highly developed value--economic gain, education or civic peace.

We have to ponder seriously these assumptions. We may lament the actions and strategy of those who make them. We may be grateful that no large portion of Negro Americans has been won to them. But neither the actions nor the number of those who thus believe disproves the validity of these beliefs.

Indeed, the reaction of the nation to date, far from disproving these assumptions, seems almost calculated to do the reverse. Much of the evidence brought forth in this decade of struggle for equal rights tends to confirm their suspicions. Certainly those of us who continue to discern the promise of the South's nobler customs and to dream the American dream must discern and dream by faith, for the reality is not yet.

As biracial associations of citizens committed to social change through the "normal channels" of fact-finding, education, negotiation, and enfranchisement, the human relations councils are uniquely situated to disprove the "black power" assumptions--if indeed they can be disproven. If the human relations council idea has any genius and destiny, it lies not in leadership of the oppressed but in its potential for education of the oppressing majority. There is a movement among the oppressed. To be sure it needs and deserves all possible aid, and those who are not themselves victims can provide technical assistance as needed and called for. But the movement is there; whereas there is as yet no significant movement among the oppressing or acquiescing majority. The dissatisfaction of the minorities is or will be aroused. What is needed is an answering dissatisfaction from those who sleep in the presence of moral--and possibly mortal--peril.

Funds problem and deadline are out. Unimpress

One member of your SRC staff tells of trying to secure help for people who were living in unheated slum housing in the midst of a cold snap in Atlanta last winter. "We had some middle class folks down there," he said, "but the emotion they felt was pity for these poor persons. As long as that is what they feel, they can't help much--because the appropriate reaction is anger." That is true. And what we need in the human relations councils is more people--a lot more people--who have the large capacity to hold in constant, creative tension anger over the misery of the minority and pity for the insensible soul-misery of the majority.

If we are to "make democracy work" in the South we shall not do so with ten or twelve thousand people, scattered through eleven states, backing the effort with an average ten dollars each. We have to be more serious and more intense than that!

Our antagonists are more serious and more intense than that. One well-known right-wing organization which, in the judgment of some of us, is doing the most effective job of indoctrinating the white people of the South claimed, about a year ago, more than 100 "chapters" in metropolitan Birmingham alone. By conservative estimate that would mean about 1,500 members in that small area. Only yesterday the Atlanta Constitution carried the boast of one of their "staff coordinators" that an estimated 150 chapters have been organized in Georgia. They have organized over the nation "committees" to counteract the civil rights movement. In Arkansas, for example, they claim such a committee in every town of over 3,000 population. And in May they lamented in print that their contributions fell a million dollars short of their mark in 1965. They spent $5 million while contributions came to only $4,089,000--up only $889,000 from the $3,200,000 contributed in 1964!

There are many variables which must be weighed into this, of course. But the conclusion is incontrovertible that those folks mean business. And so must we!

I have always thought (to paraphrase Abraham Lincoln) that all men should be free; but if any should be slaves, it should be first those who permit it for themselves, and secondly those who permit it for others. I venture the opinion that we need not be anxious, in these days, about the former. I think it evident that the non-white citizens of this nation will never again resign themselves to oppression. But I am anxious indeed that white America, and the white South in particular, may continue to be permissive of oppression for others--thus to deserve it themselves.

We have therefore a message of great urgency to get across to the comfortable majority in the South. To this task I believe the human relations councils uniquely suited. It is no new idea, but an old one. It is no radical idea, but a truly conservative one. Lincoln said it:

> This is a world of compensation; and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God, cannot long retain it.

REPORTS, INTERNAL

A Proposal for

A COOPERATIVE ACTION PROGRAM

for Southern Low-Income Groups

I. The Need and The Opportunity

Among the disadvantaged, low-income citizens of the USA, none are more numerous and few are more eager for emergence into the main stream of the American economy than the low-income population of the five states of the Deep South - Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, South Carolina, and Georgia. Most of these low-income families are rural and Negro. The greatest transformation in American agriculture has passed them by. One encouraging evidence of an awakening among them is the widespread interest in organizing cooperatives, which has led to the development of this proposal.

In many respects the situation of the ~~underprivileged~~ low income groups in the Deep South, both rural and urban, is like that of the millions of unemployed throughout the USA in the Great Depression of the thirties. Out of those dark days hundreds of cooperatives were born - self-help cooperatives, buying clubs, farmers marketing and supply cooperatives. Many of the latter, assisted by the then newly-created Farm Credit Administration and the Farm Security Administration, are today large, successful businesses, and their once poverty-stricken members are now prosperous farmers. Some of the buying clubs, especially those with substantial intellectual or labor leadership, have become superbly successful super markets with a large, prosperous, largely middle-class membership. And many a strong credit union started very small in depression days.

But the situation of the low-income groups of the Deep South today differs, in several important respects from the situation of those who in the depression organized successful cooperatives:

1. A majority of the South's depressed population are economically illiterate. They have never had a fair opportunity to sell their labor or their crops, or buy their supplies in a genuinely free market. They are constantly in debt on usurious terms. They have never had a chance to become business men, individually or collectively.

2. They lack local trained leadership, although within their groups there are potential leaders who could, given the proper information and training, direct and manage cooperatives successfully.

3. ~~Rightly or wrongly~~, many of the disadvantaged are convinced that the local power structure is opposed to any improvement in their lot, and that even the local representatives of Federal agencies will not give them help to which they are legally entitled.

It is to overcome the handicaps listed above, and to stimulate and guide cooperative development that this proposal is presented. It is essentially an adult education program designed to develop mutual self-help cooperatives of all appropriate kinds which can eventually be self-supporting.

This proposal is based upon the needs of this awakening segment of southern society, as voiced at a Cooperative Training Planning Conference at Mt. Beulah Conference Center, Edwards, Mississippi, June 9-11, 1966. The conference was attended by delegates from a representative group of low-income cooperatives already started or in the formative stage, in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Tennessee. The Planning Conference had as technical advisors a small group of cooperative educational experts selected by the Cooperative League of the USA. These men brought to the discussions the wisdom distilled from uninterrupted service in cooperative education and training from the depression days to the present. And finally this draft of the proposal was formulated and refined by a committee chosen by the Mt. Beulah Conference. This drafting committee met in Atlanta, Georgia, July 22-23, 1966.

II. Objectives

1. To raise the economic status of low-income citizens of the Southern States, by preparing them for full participation in existing cooperatives or for the creation of new and strong cooperatives to meet their needs.

   Possible cooperative developments in line with this objective are described in some detail in Part III of this proposal, entitled "Ultimate Economic Goals".

2. To bring about this economic improvement by means of group study, group action, and individual participation in democratic decision making, providing thus for the cooperative's members a training in democracy and a new sense of human dignity, and a sense of accomplishment which becomes the basis for further development.

   The training programs proposed to meet this objective are set forth in Part IV "Personal Development--The Training Programs Required".

III. Ultimate Goals. It is impossible to set precise goals -- so many credit unions, so many consumer (home supply) cooperatives, so many farmers marketing cooperatives, so many petroleum, so many farm supply cooperatives -- to be achieved in this five-year period. To set such numerical goals would be to prejudge the needs and desires of the members; it would be a denial of the basic premise of these proposals, namely, that the people themselves shall make the choice of the kind of cooperative activity they undertake.

However, on the basis of the limited information available about cooperative interest among low-income Southerners, it is not too much to imagine one or more of the following developments:

A. The organization of cooperative service centers by most of the study-action groups formed through this program. These service centers may undertake such varied group actions as:

- buying clubs for the purchase of staple household commodities at wholesale prices;
- discount agreements with local merchants for purchase of appliances, clothing and other goods by group members at listed lower cash prices;
- rent or purchase of trucks for transportation and marketing of members' produce.

Some of these cooperative service centers might expand into full-fledged consumer cooperatives. Obtaining their supplies at reasonable cost will be essential for their survival. Some items may be obtainable from existing farm supply regionals. If so, the local consumer cooperative use their services and affiliate with them in whatever way may be possible. But since no consumer cooperative wholesale now exists in the South, the local consumer cooperatives will need to organize for their survival a consumer cooperative wholesale with service branches in several trading centers in the South. If this is done, it would seem to require that this cooperative wholesale have expert guidance based upon the experience of the cooperative wholesales of the North, East and West. Such a wholesale might be organized on a fee for service basis, and the service might include educational as well as business advisory services essential to the continued success of any consumer (home supply) cooperative.

B. The organization of one or more credit unions in each of the "pockets of poverty" recognized by OEO and organized for Community Action Programs. Many of these credit unions, under the plans worked out jointly by CUNA and OEO, might be staffed in their initial stages by OEO financed employes. All of them would, as a matter of course, join their respective State Credit Union Leagues, pay dues to the Leagues and CUNA, and receive full CUNA and League services. They would eventually be self-sustaining and full partners in the overall credit union movement.

C. Petroleum cooperatives and farm supply cooperatives, particularly those handling both petroleum and fertilizer, would seem to be a natural development in many rural areas of the South. In many places such cooperatives will already be established and ready to include new members. Where it is necessary to organize new cooperatives they may find their economic source of supplies in existing farm supply wholesales; in others they may need to organize their own wholesale. Such a wholesale, limited in capital, may be able to survive and offer the full educational and business services it should, if it can make its contracts for supplies through strong, friendly farm supply regionals in neighboring states.

D. Farm marketing cooperatives of specialized products may or may not be able to establish connections with existing cooperatives marketing the same products. Wherever possible this should be done. Where low-income farmers find it necessary to organize a new marketing cooperative, it is quite probable that such cooperatives may need to handle also farm supplies and join with a federation of farm supply cooperatives in order to survive.

E. Industrial or Handicraft Cooperatives have already sprung up, especially in some parts of Mississippi. The future of this type of cooperative will depend on many factors, not the least of which will be the extent to which markets can be developed and the extent to which technical questions of design can be met. In the textile and leather industries, where style is master, and fashion is fickle, a strong central organization is indispensable, for product development, quality control and successful marketing.

F. A central fee-supported educational federation should emerge as the best way to carry on a self-sustaining educational, training and business advisory service for the local cooperatives aided by this Project in their initial stages. The Southern Consumers Cooperative Association has initiated such a program by creating the non-profit Southern Consumers Educational Foundation to which each member must pay $5.00 membership fee before he can begin to accumulate share capital and voting rights in the cooperative itself.

The development of a central educational federation could be stimulated, from the first, by offering each study-action group organized, the following educational services:

1. a monthly newsletter to each member of the group
2. continuation of the educational services of the field staff of the Project
3. an annual state-wide conference for study-action and cooperative group members

The continuation of these services could be conditioned on the payment by the individual members of an annual one-dollar subscription fee. The one-dollar subscription fee would become a one-dollar annual membership fee in the federation when it is organized. The Project should further subsidize the federation, if necessary, after it takes over the educational services listed above.

It seems premature at this stage to predict either the form or the extent of the central cooperative educational and financial service organizations which may be set up by the cooperatives organized under this Project. But it is not too soon to recognize that the solution of this problem will be the ultimate test of the success of this project and of the cooperatives it helps bring into being.

IV. Personnel Development -- The Training Programs Required

It is not enough to achieve strong economic institutions as a result of this program. The project will have been a failure if it fails to produce men--members who understand and accept the responsibilities that go with cooperative membership and leaders who can wisely guide their groups in the search for sound cooperative businesses, and who can efficiently direct and manage those businesses when established. Such members and such leaders are not to be thought of as a means to a goal. In a truer sense, they themselves are the goal. "The best co-op product is a cooperator" is as true today as it was in the depression when Harvey Hall made it the slogan of the Indiana farmers cooperatives.

How then can this project produce -- or rather discover and develop these informed and loyal members, among an ill-informed low-income population? How shall their potential leaders be discovered and their latent talents developed -- potential organizers, capable candidates for elective cooperative office, committee men, managers, employees without whose understanding of cooperatives and dedication to cooperation as a way of business, cooperative success will be impossible? And, indeed, how can these loyal members and dedicated leaders be found and developed without first having a competent, dedicated and well-trained staff for the project itself?

To meet these needs of personnel discovery and development is the heart of this project. The training programs proposed are here listed in the reverse order from their undertaking, beginning with the basic training for potential members which is the foundation upon which the whole developing cooperative business structure will ultimately rest.

A. Study and Action Groups, locally. These educational groups, already referred to, will become the core of each cooperative group organized. This follows the pattern of the world-famous Antigonish movement in Nova Scotia and the most promising low-income cooperative development in the southern states today, the Southern Consumers Cooperative Association, with its sister educational organization, the Southern Consumers Educational Foundation, which is organized into small local "chapters" or "action groups". The purposes of the study-action groups organized under this project will be:

1. to determine for themselves their own most urgent needs and to determine which of these needs could be met by joining an existing cooperative and which could only be met by organizing a new cooperative.
   (This means encouraging the group to "make their own survey and feasibility studies," with whatever technical assistance and guidance they may "call in,")

2. to study the essentials for success of the cooperative enterprise under consideration, particularly in terms of available business volume, capital required, and necessary member loyalty.
   (These considerations lead directly to the next point, basic cooperative understanding.)

3. to acquire a mastery of the cooperative principles and practices essential to the success of the enterprise.
   (This has been the goal of such "study groups" in Nova Scotia, in Ohio, in India, in Puerto Rico and many other places.)

4. to acquire capital for the cooperative planned by regular weekly or monthly savings deposited with the action group during (and after) its period of initial studies.
   (This technique has been widely and successfully used by credit unions and other cooperatives, even among the very poor, in countries all around the world. This technique is one of the most effective known to stimulate "capital formation", the most acute problem of any low-income, economically disadvantaged segment of society. It stimulates this capital formation by transferring small sums regularly from consumption (at high prices) to savings. As they said in Puerto Rico of their cooperative developments, the impoverished jibaros ("hillbillies") became "penny capitalists"-- penny capitalists, but capitalists nonetheless.)

5. to visit as a group, or as delegates from the group, successful cooperatives already started elsewhere.
   (This technique was one of the most effective means of organizing and expanding cooperatives used by CCA of Kansas City in organizing the farm supply cooperatives of the central Midwest. It helps the group to think in larger, but realistic terms, in terms of successes within their own reach.)

6. to stimulate the imagination of the group's members, to plan ahead, to go on from one success to another and another.
   (The genius of successful cooperation is that success in one field widens members'horizons and leads to other and equally successful services for the members. Groups should not be disbanded when their first cooperative venture has been launched. They should continue, both to make sure of the success of that first venture, and when it is assured to discover other needs which can be met cooperatively.)

7. to develop in the group's members, as a by-product of successful cooperative business action, a firm and soundly based self-confidence in their ability to handle their own economic affairs, as a group and individually .

   (This is the final value of the cooperative and of the group out of which it was born. It cannot be measured by patronage savings alone. It is an intangible, but with very tangible results in community prosperity.)

B. Selection and Training of the Staff of the Project. The new section of this proposal, Part V, "Staff and Administration" lists the specialists to be provided for the central staff of the project and each of the five state offices. It also describes the field force, referred to elswhere in this proposal as "field workers" or more technically as "cooperative counsellors". All of the project personnel--central, state and field will require intensive training before beginning their duties.

1. An orientation seminar or workshop of one or two weeks duration for central and state office staff. This should be held as soon as the Director, his Assistant, State Directors and their principal staff specialists have been chosen. This workshop should be held in the South, with participants including the staff of the project, and a number of outside "experts", i.e. sociologists trained in the dynamics of group action, economists specializing in cooperative credit and business, and cooperative educators with experience both in the USA and in developing economies abroad. Since all the central office and state office staff will be specialists, professionally trained, this orientation workshop will be designed to orient them to the special task of relating their professional skills to the problems of low-income people, and particularly the low-income people of the South.

   Representatives of regional cooperatives able and willing to accept low-income members will be invited and urged to participate in the initial workshop, as well as subsequent refresher courses.

2. Selection and training of the field force or "cooperative counsellors".

   a. Selection of the field force. It is proposed to place a field force of approximately twenty competent, trained persons in each state, each assigned to a specific area of one or more counties, to stimulate and assist each study-action group all the way from initial inquiries to the establishment and successful operation of the cooperative venture or venture eventually undertaken. For this task it is proposed to recruit socially-minded, well-educated southerners, with some professional training and experience. Especial effort will be made to interest returning Peace Corps volunteers and VISTA volunteers. Salaries are suggested at the level of well-paid public teachers. It is the aim to enlist competent persons, willing and able to enter a career with a five year future with the project and the possibility of eventual employment at good salaries by the cooperatives they help found. They need not be versed in cooperatives when selected.

b. Intensive training courses for the field force, to be given as the field staff is recruited. Each course should be six weeks in length, should be held at a central location in the South, should be held when about 20 staff members have been employed, and should include field observation trips to cooperative enterprises in successful operation, both low-income and middle-class cooperatives and credit unions. These intensive training courses might be set up at the Arkansas A. M. and N. College, Pine Bluff, if they develop the special course now under consideration for the training of foreign students coming to the USA under AID grants to study cooperatives.

3. Refresher courses or workshops for all staff and field force to be held every six months. At these refresher courses and workshops, materials may be prepared and revised and case studies and role-playing devised out of actual experiences.

C. Training the local group leadership

From the very first meeting of the field worker or cooperative counsellor with the group, the potential leaders will begin to emerge. In the earliest stages, these persons will be the discussion leaders; in later stages they will be the elected organization committee; still later the board of directors, and such continuing committees as the education committee and the supervisory committee. All these, in their turn will need training, in the special techniques required for successful leadership in the positions they hold. The project, therefore, must provide:

1. Local leadership training courses, for organization committee members, for boards of directors, for other committee members and voluntary workers, whose greater understanding of cooperative problems and principles is essential for the success of group enterprise. These local leadership training courses will be held in local communities or in districts embracing several local groups, whenever the need arises, at the request of the local leaders, relayed through the area cooperative counsellor. Instruction to be provided by . the state "roving staff" with its mobile unit
   . cooperative leaders "called in" by the state director

2. Technical training for lay cooperative officers -- president (as presiding officer), secretary, treasurer, supervisory committee, education committee. Specific training dealing with the problems of these non-paid, voluntary and elective officers. This technical training will take two forms:
   (a) "coaching" by the area cooperative counsellor
   (b) group courses, for officers of the same position from several cooperative groups -- training to be given by the state staff "roving counsellors," the auditor-analyst on the state staff, and/or other cooperative technicians called in.
   (c) on the job "internship", a few days at a time, with existing cooperatives, which agree to provide this experience. This is an important part of the technique employed in credit union development.

   Particularly since most of these elected or volunteer officers will be low-income persons who can ill afford or cannot afford at all the time, travel and expense involved in such technical training courses, they should be reimbursed by the Project for all these costs.

D. Selection and Training of Managers for New Cooperatives

1. Selection of potential managers for training will be based upon the following principles:

   a. During the period while study-action groups are developing plans for cooperative action a pool of potential managers should be selected and trained, sufficient to staff these cooperatives when they are ready to go into operation.

   b. (1) It is anticipated that managers as well as the rest of the employed staff of cooperatives and credit unions assisted in this program will come largely from within the groups themselves. The development of business leadership from within the low-income groups themselves is one of the major objectives of the program. It is strictly within the American "office-boy-to-president" tradition.

   (2) It is proposed that talented young men within study-action groups may be recommended for management training by the cooperative counsellors, prior to the time the cooperative is ready to open for business. These young men, sent for training, may be employed at the conclusion of their training by their own group, or by some other group, depending on local circumstances.

2. Training potential managers must be thorough and must embrace both theory and practice:

   a. a course in management, probably one month in length, at a southern educational institution--this course to be repeated as many times a year as management trainees are available. Trainees will receive salaries and have all expenses paid. Planning the academic course in management should be done in consultation with the staff of the International Cooperative Training Center, University of Wisconsin and with the directors of such other cooperative training centers as the CCA School of Cooperation, Kansas City.

   b. "on-the-job training," field experience for each management trainee, in a cooperative where he can obtain the maximum amount of experience relevant to the management job to which he expects to return. For this field on-the-job training the trainee will have to go, perhaps, to another state; his travel expenses and salary will be borne entirely by the Project.

   The field training "on-the-job" should be planned in collaboration with the staff of the Board for International Cooperative Training, Inc. who have a panel of over 500 cooperatives across the nation who have agreed to give short-term field training in cooperatives to trainees from abroad. In addition, the Program Coordinator has in preparation a smaller, very select panel of cooperatives prepared to undertake a centrally directed, longer term on-the-job training.

V. Staff and Administration

The Southern Regional Council will furnish the staff and will administer the project, with the assistance of an Advisory Board representing the co-sponsoring organizations. A brief outline of the administrative structure follows.

A. A central administrative office, staffed by highly trained specialists
- a Director, the administrative head of the entire project, a man with administrative experience and empathy for the low-income groups of the South
- an Assistant Director, who may also be in charge of research, the search for active and incipient cooperative interest groups
- a "roving" Field Supervisor, available for promotional and planning assistance anywhere in the region, on call
- a Study-Action Group Director, to provide guidance and discussion materials to the field force and to the study-action groups
- a Cooperative Specialist, with organizational experience in several types of cooperatives, who would work closely with the Cooperative League and with regional cooperatives
- a Credit Union Specialist, working closely with CUNA International
- an Editor for the study-group news letter
- a Legal Counsel, versed in cooperative law
- an audio-visual expert, to assist in preparing materials -- charts, movies, simple literature in the vernacular
- a Comptroller, to handle all accounts
- necessary secretarial office personnel

B. A state office for each of the five states with:
- a State Director
- a Cooperative Specialist, working with existing cooperatives and furnishing expertise to the field force
- a Credit Union Specialist, working with the State Credit Union League
- an Auditor-Analyst, to offer needed business services (audits, analysis of financial statements, and business advice)
- two "roving counsellors", equipped with a well-equipped mobile audio-visual unit, to provide additional educational assistance when called in by the locally assigned advisers, especially
  - (a) in the early stages, to get an educational group study going
  - (b) for supporting and more advanced training conferences, as the local program proceeds
  - (c) for district or regional training conferences of leadership personnel of cooperative groups in the process of organizing or in the early stages of business operations
- a lawyer or lawyers, on retainer fees, to assist in drafting legal papers for new cooperatives
- necessary secretarial office personnel

C. A field staff of active, dedicated, well-trained cooperative counsellors ("generalists," not specialists, in one particular kind of cooperative), each assigned to a specific area (county or parish). It is contemplated this will require twenty (20) trained field staff personnel in each state covered, each equipped with a car, a stock of literature and other teaching aids. This staff will:

1. Seek out all low-income cooperatives and credit unions in operation or in process of organization and all groups inquiring about cooperatives and/or credit unions, in order to offer them the services listed below.

2. Provide educational guidance and materials to enable study and action groups to determine how their needs can be met by cooperative action and to understand fully what cooperative action will require of its members.

3. Provide organization guidance and assistance, personally and on the spot, to action groups at every step in the critical process of organizing a successful cooperative business. Note that this will include "calling in" the necessary technical assistance from the state office and, if necessary, from such existing cooperative service organizations as the Cooperative League, CUNA International and State Credit Union Leagues and regional cooperatives and such Federal agencies as OEO, FHA and the Agricultural Extension Service.

D. An Advisory Board will be set up, including, among others, representatives of the following co-sponsors:

. The Cooperative League of the USA which has staff available to assist in planning high level seminars, workshops and training courses; and cooperative educational materials available for reproduction in simple, vernacular language.

. CUNA International which will make available directly and through the State Credit Union Leagues all plans and materials developed by the CUNA Anti-Poverty Program.

. Southern Consumers Cooperative Association which offers its projects as pilot plants for observation and study in the development of this Southern Regional Council five-state program.

. National Sharecroppers Union which offers its long experience in seeking constructive programs for and with southern low-income groups.

In addition, regional cooperative organizations able and willing to accept low-income cooperators and cooperatives into full membership will be asked to nominate members for the Advisory Board.

Membership on the Advisory Board shall not entail financial responsibility for any part of this project, the Southern Regional Council retaining full control of the funds, and assuming full responsibility to the donors for the proper disbursement of the funds.

VI. Relationship with Government Agencies

It is the intention to make the maximum use possible of services available from state and federal agencies. Specifically:

- The Office of Economic Opportunity will be kept informed of the overall plans, and its local Community Action groups will be involved in specific projects to the greatest extent possible, and OEO will be called on for the appropriate financial support.

- The Farmers Home Administration will be kept informed on all agricultural cooperative projects and will be asked to provide advice, and, where appropriate, financial assistance for specific projects.

- The Agricultural Extension Service and the Land-Grant Universities of the respective states, will be called upon for technical advice and assistance wherever appropriate.

It is the intent to maintain close relations at all levels with these and other available government service agencies. The Director of the project will keep in touch with national agencies. The State Directors will keep the appropriate state agencies informed at all times, and each member of the field force will be responsible for keeping the appropriate local officials in his area informed of the cooperative projects and needs in his area. But all requests for assistance and funds should come directly from the local study-action groups or the cooperatives they set up.

VII. Timetable

First year

(Getting started in five states. A budget year; actual time from first receipt of funds, probably 15 months)

(two months)

Selection of central staff and state directors
Orientation Seminar (two weeks)
Establishment of central office

(three months)

Employment state staffs - in all five states
Establishment of state offices
Employment of field workers ("cooperative counsellors")
(100 in all , for all five states)
Securing five mobile field units

(ten months)

Five intensive training courses for field workers ("cooperative counsellors")
(one month for each group of twenty, the first twenty hired, regardless of state in which they will work)
Hopefully, about eight months of regular field work
Average length of service for first group of field workers first year
Hopefully, first regular manager training courses

Second year (project in full operation)

Complete staff of field workers if any vacancies, or if any replacements needed.
Eight one-week refresher courses; six for field workers who have had one year of service, two for new field workers
Manager training courses continued

Third year (continue with full staff, 100 field workers)

Ten one-week small group refresher courses for field workers and staff, or five small and one for entire staff together
Concentrate efforts on development of service and educational federations of cooperatives, for continuation of the project functions after completion of the project

VII. Timetable (continued)

Fourth year (begin consolidation and phasing out)

Two auditor-analysts, self-supporting (that is, employed by a cooperative federation or non-profit organization serving the newly-created cooperatives of low-income membership)

Reduce staff of field workers as cooperative federations undertake their own field work; hopefully, a 20% transfer of field staff from the Project to self-supporting cooperative service organizations during the year

Continue refresher courses and workshops

Fifth year (phasing out)

Three remaining auditor-analysts, and as much as possible of central and state staffs transfer to self-supporting cooperatives service organizations during the year

Select members of field staff similarly during the year transfer to employment with self-supporting cooperative service organizations; remainder released, as their projects phase out

Sixth year (completion of project)

Retain skeleton central staff and a limited number of field representatives, if there are

(1) any incomplete local projects
(2) any incomplete projects for the creation of self-supporting cooperative service organizations
(3) any unexpended funds

VIII. Budget Estimates

The budget estimates, given in detail on the attached pages are based upon the following premises:

1. Salaries form the major part of the expenditures in any grassroots educational program. This program is no exception. The total salaries for 136 persons is $4,696,800. With fringe benefits of $534,730 this is 73% of the overall cash costs.

   The salary estimates have been made on these assumptions:

   (a) that the executive salaries should be in line with salaries offered by business, the government or the universities for professional services of similar grade.

   (b) that the field staff should receive remuneration at approximately the level of public school teaching positions in the South. It might be possible to recruit persons on an altruistic cost-of-living basis like the Peace Corps or VISTA, but such volunteers could scarcely be expected to serve five years. For this reason, if no other, the field staff is put on a semi-professional basis.

2. Capital expenditures indicated in the estimates by an asterisk (*) are included in the cash budget along with current operating costs. Of total capital outlay, $366,000, five-sixths is for cars -- one for each of the field force and 22 additional for the staff. The figures are for used cars (one-year old standard models at an average of $1500). An allowance is made for trade-ins, as may be required in subsequent years. The used cars may, in the end, cost as much as new cars, but they avoid the air of superiority which might be created by field personnel driving big, new cars while working with low-income people.

3. An overhead allowance should be allowed for overall administration. At 10% of salaries (the usual government allowance for "off-campus" services) this adds up as follows:

Cash budget estimates	$7,108,130
Overhead (10% salaries)	469,480
Overall grand total	$7,577,810

Negroes Riot, Fight Police in Baltimore

RIOTS (new file)

AC 4/25/66

By GEORGE BOWEN

BALTIMORE, Md. (AP)—Fighting and rock-throwing broke out Sunday night among a crowd of about 75 customers at Gwynn Oak amusement park in suburban Baltimore County.

One policeman was injured and four juveniles were taken into custody. State and county police controlled the disturbance an hour after it started.

Police said their first reports indicated about 500 persons were rioting and some state troopers were dispatched from as far away as 30 miles.

The park west of Baltimore City was the scene of massive racial demonstrations in the summer of 1963, when Negroes were not admitted. The park integrated later that year.

OFFICER INJURED

A Baltimore County policeman, Joe Allen Talley, was hit on the head with a grapefruit-sized rock during the melee. He was treated at a hospital and released.

The trouble started with a fight on the parking lot which leads to the park entrance, said Inspector Elmer F. Adams of Baltimore County who was on the scene.

All of those involved were Negroes, he said.

A hard rain began falling as police arrived. The park patrons grabbed helmets and ties of the policemen, then boarded one of several parked buses.

Adams said police got them out of the bus with a police dog, then rocks began flying.

James Price, one of the owners of the park, said afterward there were no racial overtones to the "incident," as he called it.

In his opinion, Price said, the cause of the trouble was several hundred persons trying to board three buses when the sudden cloudburst began.

4 JUVENILES ARRESTED

The four Negro juveniles, all about 16, were taken to the Woodlawn station. Police said they were charged with being delinquent and would be taken before juvenile court Monday.

The disturbance broke out about four hours before the 11 p.m. closing of the privately owned park, which opened for the season last Sunday.

During racial demonstrations there July 4 and July 7 of 1963, hundreds were arrested, including Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, chief executive officer of the United Presbyterian Church.

An hour after Sunday night's trouble, everything was peaceful as a racially mixed crowd rode the rides and played the games.

California Police, 200 Negroes Clash

RIOTS

BAKERSFIELD, Calif., May 23 (UPI)—Negro youths in a milling, cursing crowd of more than 200 persons hurled bricks, rocks and bottles at law enforcement officers Sunday night after police made a routine investigation of an auto accident.

One youth, Theodore Roberson, 17, was shot in the leg when police said he attempted to strike an officer with a bottle. He was not seriously wounded and was booked on a charge of assault on a police officer.

The other Negroes, John Franklin Herron, 19, and Samuel Pollard, 21, were booked on arson charges for setting fires in trash barrels next to buildings.

In all, police said 20 adults were arrested on charges ranging from assault to resisting arrest and disturbing the peace. Sighteen juveniles were taken into custody for violation of curfew and being near the scene of a riot.

The initial attack, by youths in a group of about 50 Negroes, occurred shortly after 7 p.m. as two motorcycle officers questioned two Negro drivers at an intersection adjacent to California Park, where an estimated 2,000 Negroes held a "grist and gripes" picnic Saturday to discuss dissatisfaction with the Bakersfield City Council.

The pair, first heckled and then pelted, quickly radioed for aid and soon the area —in the predominantly Negro Lakeview section of southeast Bakersfield —swarmed with 150 police, sheriff's deputies and California highway patrolmen.

During the continuing violence, officers said the crowd swelled to more than 200 persons.

Two officers were injured, neither seriously, and a Caucasian cab driver was slightly injured when a rock crashed through his windshield.

Fire officials said that during the height of the conflict a Molotov cocktail was thrown against the side of a fire station. It ignited against a brick wall but did no damage.

Ironically, witnesses said the fire bomb was thrown from an auto occupied by two Caucasians.

Most of the city's 7,500 Negroes live in the Lakeview district.

MEMORANDUM

TO: State Council Directors

FROM: Ed Stanfield

SUBJECT: Next Meeting of State Council Directors

As you know, our next meeting is to be September 21-22, starting at 2:00 on Wednesday and ending about noon on Thursdaym. We shall meet in the S. R. C. conference room.

The Southern Interagency Conference wiull be meeting from 2:00 on the 20th until noon on the 21st, and you are invited to attend that meeting also. It might be of considerable interest to you. Dr. Lewis Killian of the University of Florida will speak on the first afternoon on the role of white liberals in social change in the South. Other features of that meeting will be briefings on the political situation by Vernon Jordan and on school and hospital desegregation by representatives of the regional office of H. E. W. (The latter presentation will be on Wednesday morning, so you might catch that even if you can't come on Tuesday.)

For our own meeting, following the suggestion of some of you, I have invited two men from government agencies here to talk to us about program concerns and the role of their offices. They are Bob Thompson, Special Assistant for Intergroup Relations to the Regional Director of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; and Don Hollowell, Regional Director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In addition, we may have the H. E. W. representatives stay over from the SI I. C. meeting - in case some of you can't get here early.

As for expenses, let us try the following formula: S. R. C. will pay one-half of your expenses for travel, room and meals, plus all travel cost in excess of $50.00. In this way the distance somed have to travel will not be an excessive burden. We can make any adjustmentsin this formual after trying it once.

I am going to leave it to you to get your own accommodations, so that you can order exactly the room you want. Since most seemed satisfied with the Americana Motor Hotel, let me suggest that one. Perhaps I'll arrange a dinner for us there on the evening of the 21st.

Personnel

Frances Dukler has been named Acting Director of the Houston Council on Human Relations. Frances, a long-time member of the Houston Council's Board of Directors, has agreed to "fill in" until an Executive Director can be found to succeed Robert Alexander. The state council directors had a chance to meet Frances at their September 21-22 get-together in Atlanta -- and went away hoping she would apply for the job, permanent.

The death of Mr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Associate Director of the Georgia Council on Human Relations, grieved all of us. Mr. Holmes died September 19. Frances Pauley of the Georgia Council and Vernon Jordan of SRC were among those who spoke briefly at his funeral on September 22.

Paul Wahrhaftig has joined the staff of the Georgia Council. Mr. Wahrhaftig is an attorney, which will probably turn the other state councils green with envy. Paul was born in Oakland, California. He was graduated with honors from Stanford University in 1960 with a degree in political science. His legal training was at Boalt Hall, University of California Law School. For two years he practiced in Oakland with the firm of McKee, Tasheiva and Wahrhaftig. He spent last summer with the American Friends Service Committee, tutoring for school desegregation in South Carolina.

SRC Staff Additions

Mrs. Hattie Johnson, who hails from Montgomery, Alabama, has joined the SRC staff where she will work part time as assistant to the Treasurer and part time as secretary in the Labor Project.

William Farmar has come to SRC since the last newsletter to assist John Boone in our Prison Administration and Criminal Rehabilitation Project. Mr. Farmar is from Chicago. He attended the University of Chicago and worked for the Cook County Welfare Department.

Most of the state council staffs have by this time met Louise Cole, who has been administering our Paperback Books Project among other things. Louise has become a permanent member of the SRC staff as a research associate. Born in Pensacola, Florida, she received her B. A. from Newcomb College of Tulane University. In her junior year she studied at the University of Sheffield, England. Despite her natural modesty Miss Cole admits, when pressed, to being a Phi Beta Kappa and a Woodrow Wilson Fellow. After ~~XXXXX~~ Tulane she took a Master's in political science at the University of California at Berkeley. She comes to SRC after a short stint with Buttenheim Publishing Corporation in New York City.

John A. Pecoul, Jr., came to SRC on a temporary basis September 5. He is working on some research projects and ~~xxxx~~ in the field department. John, who is from New Orleans, was valedictorian of his class at Alcee Fortier High School there. He received a B. A. in philosophy from Elmhurst College in 1961, ranking first in his class. In 1964 he was graduated magna cum laude from Union Theological Seminary, second in his class. He has just received his M.A. in political science from Temple University. His wife's name is Ellen. ~~XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX~~

Project on Penal Reform and Criminal Rehabilitation Making Progress

Staffing of the Penal Reform Project is complete with the employment of Mr. William Farmar, as noted above. With an assist from state council directors research on existing conditions is in progress under the coordination of Dr. Vernon Fox of Florida State University. Before November 1 Dr. Fox and SRC staff members will correlate and evaluate the material and publish a Southern Regional Council Special Report .

Other plans include research on comparative sentencing policies in felony cases with particular emphasis on disparity in length of sentence attributable to race or socio-economic level; technical assistance to state prison systems, especially on racial integration; penal reform programs in Arkansas (one of the worst states in this respect) and Mississippi; wides distribution of information about corrections in fact-sheet or brochure form; and recruitment of Negroes for professional training in the field of corrections.

Women's Meetings on Unequal Justice

With the cooperation of the human relations councils and practically all women's organizations, Mrs. M. E. Tilly, SRC's director of women's work, is conducting a series of meetings in ~~xxxx~~ the southern states to arouse and coordinate interest in court proceedings, sentencing practices, etc., in southern courts. ~~XXXXXXXXXXX~~ The purpose is to prepare women groups and others to visit courts, observe, report findings, and --hopefully -- effect less discriminatory administration of ~~xxx~~ justice.

Meetings have already been held in Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina. Mrs. Tilly's schedule for the rest of the fall reads as follows: Virginia, October 19; North Carolina, October 20; Kentucky, October 26; Tennessee, October 27; Alabama, November 2; Louisiana, November 9; Mississippi, November 10; and Arkansas, November 15.

Helpful Meetings in Atlanta

The state council directors are meeting more frequently this year in an effort at better coordination of program and exchange of ideas, as well as professional edification. They were in Atlanta for three days, September 20-22, for a meeting of the Southern Interagency Conference and an overnight meeting of their own.

Highlight of the SIC meeting was a presentation by Dr. Lewis Killian of Florida State University on "The Role of White Liberals in Social Change in the South." There was a reactor panel, and interest was high. Of particular interest was the rather general feeling that white liberals (and moderates), including the Washington establishment, are backing away from civil rights.

At their own meeting the directors had sessions with Samuel Younge, Assistant to the Regional Director for Civil Rights, Department of Health, Education and Welfare; Bob Thompson, Regional Office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; and Don Hollowell of the Atlanta Office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Georgia Council Programs

Another helpful feature of our Atlanta meeting was a how-we-did it report by Francis Pauley of the Georgia Council on their welfare research project and their "Know Your Rights" program in cooperation with A.C.L.U. of Georgia.

With the help of the Columbia University School of Social Work and the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, the Georgia Council conducted research on the Aid to Families With Dependent Children program in four Georgia counties. A good questionnaire was prepared with expert aid; then 180 families were interviewed. Basically the council wanted to answer the question "Are children in need receiving their rights under the law?" And the answer they come up with is "No." Welfare boards and administrators tend to look upon welfare as a charity and not as a legal right. They discovered case after case of arbitrary withholding of aid to which applicants were legally entitled. Although their full report has not yet been published, the GCHR has already secured a lengthy and, on the whole, sympathetic hearing from the Georgia Department of Family and Chilren Services.

Another Georgia project of particular interest is really a joint effort by the GCHR, SRC, and the Georgia ACLU. It is publication of a booklet titled "Know Your Rights," which tells in simple language and with liberal use of illustrations (by Marge Manderson of SRC) what rights an individual has when arrested by a law officer.

"Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia"

Fully 1,500 people, three-fourths of them laymen, are expected to attend a Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond on November 28 and 29. It is planned under the auspices of the Virginia Council on Human Relations in cooperation with leaders of the statewide religious community.

Among the subjects to be dealt with are "The Theological Bases for the Social Concern of the Religious Community," "The Role of the Religious Community in the Concern for Fair Housing," "The Role of the Religious Community in Changing Educational Patterns, "The Responsibility of the Religious Community to Set Its Own House in Order," and "Where Do We Go From Here?" Leaders include George D. Kelsey, John F. Cronin, Jacob M. Rothschild, Warren H. Turner, and Carlyle Marney. There will be a special student section with 200 students and 60 seminarians in attendance. Their featured speaker will be Samuel D. Proctor, special assistant to the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Random Notes

cloture

... A memorandum from the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights notes that the Senate votes on the minimum wage bill and the 1966 civil rights bill, cloture resolution, both came within one hour. Minimum wage increase and extension was won; civil rights lost. But the proximity brought out sharply "that the same Senators who support civil rights tend also to support programs for economic and social advancement." Or you might say that people who have no regard for Negroes have, when you get right down to it, no regard for anybody except themselves, of course.

... The annual meeting of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations will be held in Jackson on October 27. Roger Wilkins, Director of the Community Relations Service, U. S. Department of Justice, will be the featured speaker.

... The Florida Council's annual meet will be in Daytona Beach on October 14 and 15.

...The Louisiana Council office has been opened at 7986 Scenic Highway in Baton Rouge. And beautiful it is, too, thanks to the impeccable taste of executive director Pat Miller. I think the attractiveness of the office will say something important to every visitor. Congratulations to Pat and the LCHR.

... I like a paper that Augie VandenBosche of the Florida Council drew up to help answer a question he kept getting, "What can a local council on human relations do?" Augie catalogues and describes a number of roles for the local council: communictor, fact finder, educator, programmer, consultant, cooperator, observer, attitude refiner. We've lost something in translation, here, but it is a neat and useful summary.

... Under the able administration of Louise Cole the paperback books project is looking up. Louise prepared lists of books in several categories -- such as "leisure reading for youth and adults,""leisure reading for children," "Negro history and culture," "reference books," etc. -- and has been distributing them. That seems to be what turned the trick, for requests are coming in with increasing frequency now. Thanks, too, to the state council staffs for helping to get the word out.

... We at SRC are rejoicing that a jury in Fulton County Superior Court ruled in our favor in a case involving allegations that we should not be classified a tax-exempt organization on grounds that we are a "propaganda" outfit. For one thing, our faith in humanity was kept alive by the fact that the jury apparently ruled on the merits under the law and contrary to their personal sentiments about our position. But we have also been given several minutes worth of something to think about in the comment of the jury foreman: "If you are a propaganda agency, you sure are doing a lousy job, because none of us had ever heard of you!"

1967 GRANT-IN-AID SCHEDULE

Southern Regional Council

Alabama	$ 15,300
Arkansas	13,600
Florida	13,000
Georgia	14,600
Louisiana	14,000
Mississippi	16,000
North Carolina	13,800
South Carolina	13,600
Tennessee	15,000
Virginia	13,100
Houston	5,000
Contingency	2,000
Mitchell Award	1,000
TOTAL	$150,000

GRANT-IN-AID CONDITIONS

1. All grants are contingent upon the ability of the SRC to raise the total grant-in-aid budget. Should this not be possible, the necessary reductions will be made on a pro rata basis.

2. One-fourth of the total projected grant-in-aid to each council will be paid on the first of each quarter of the calendar year, subject to receipt of the required reports due and to fulfillment of all other grant conditions.

3. The required reports are:

a. One copy of an audit by a Certified Public Accountant for the Council's last fiscal year. If an audit has not been received by July 1, the quarterly payment then due will be suspended automatically, pending action of the SRC's Executive Committee.

b. A list of the names and addresses of officers and policy board members of the state council and the chairmen (or presidents) of all local councils as of January 1, 1967. Revisions should be sent when made.

c. Two copies of an adequate, orderly program report for each quarter. If, in the judgment of the SRC staff, this report is not satisfactory, grant payments will be suspended pending adequate amendment or action of the Executive Committee.

d. Two copies of a monthly financial statement showing receipts for the month and for the fiscal year to date from each of the following categories: SRC Grants-in-Aid, Foundations, Membership Dues, Individual Contributions, Business Contributions, and Miscellaneous (sale of literature, dinners, etc.). A similar breakdown of expenditures for the month and year to date for all budget and non-budget items is suggested.

e. Two copies of a monthly report on membership showing chapter-by-chapter the number of dues-paid members enrolled or re-enrolled during the month and during the membership year to date. Categories for out-of-state and at-large members should be included.

4. In keeping with the general purpose of the grant-in-aid program, to facilitate growth of state councils into basically self-sustaining membership organizations, it is expected that staff strength and income from local sources will be maintained at least at the 1966 level. If, in the judgment of the SRC staff, the funding and staffing of a council falls below that level, grant payments will be suspended pending action of the Executive Committee.

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL
5 Forsyth Street
Atlanta, Georgia

PROGRAM ASSISTANCE AVAILABLE TO COUNCILS ON HUMAN RELATIONS

The Southern Regional Council now has available funds in modest amounts and staff consultants in certain program areas to assist projects of local and state councils on human relations. The program concerns with which we are able to assist will be outlined below. But first there are some general requirements which should be kept in mind by councils needing assistance.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

Use of Consultants

Much of the assistance we are in position to offer is in the form of consultant services. The directors of our "special projects" and their associates are available to help with specific problems at the request of human relations councils or other groups. In addition, the SRC can pay consultant fees and expenses for an expert in matters specified below which are not covered by one of our special projects or where the need is for knowledge or skills which our staff persons do not have.

It should be kept in mind that the special project directors are trying to accomplish a great deal with limited budget and staff. The time ~~and money~~ that they can devote to education about their purposes and programs is necessarily restricted. Requests for help with specific problems or projects can be answered more readily than requests for participation in conferences, speeches, etc.

Scope and Cost

For some program areas we can supply small cash grants. The SRC is not a foundation, however, and does not have large sums of money available. Imaginative proposals which are apt to bring significant results with minimum expenditure have the best chance of approval. In general we want to enable volunteers to work effectively; our resources are insufficient to provide salaries, office space, and other needs for staffed operations.

Lead Time

Groups should submit requests and proposals to the SRC and secure our commitment of funds before committing themselves to projects. Occasionally groups obligate themselves, assuming that SRC funds are available, only to find that their project, as planned, does not fit our policy requirements or the donor's stipulations. In such cases we can only reject the proposal. Frequently, however, had we been informed far enough in advance, we could have offered suggestions which would have made the project acceptable to both the SRC and the sponsoring group.

Imagination and Innovation

The SRC ordinarily cannot support "group maintenance" functions -- the things that are done to keep an organization going. We are interested in specific projects. For example, there is little interest in helping a student organization publish a newsletter, but transportation money for a tutorial program or a voter-registration project might very well be provided. We probably would not pay the cost of printing a descriptive brochure about a fair-housing group, but could provide a consultant on a neighborhood stabilization problem and buy literature for distribution in a neighborhood stabilization effort.

SRC'S SPECIAL PROJECTS

The Southern Regional Council has five "special projects". These are programs for which funds have been secured for a limited period -- two or three years -- to work at a problem which the Council thinks is urgent at this time. Each special project has a director and most have additional staff persons.

Voter Education Project

The Voter Education Project (which is our second VEP) is directed by Mr. Vernon Jordan. ~~Like the first VEP~~ As was the case with the first VEP, there is a major emphasis on voter registration. For this purpose local affiliates of the five major civil rights organization have been found to be most effective ordinarily, although both a state and a local council have been funded to do voter registration.

In this sedond VEP, however, there will be two other concerns: citizenship education and leadership development. Both are designed to assist long-disenfranchised Negroes toward effective participation in the whole political process. We feel that human relations councils, as well as other groups, can do much in the way of citizenship education.

One group -- it was not a human relations council, but might well have been -- secured a grant of only $200 to pay the cost of transporting a borrowed voting machine to various locations in their county and sending out postal card invitations to newly registered voters. They taught more than 1500 people how to operate a voting machine. In fact, not everyone who felt the need to practice and came to do so was a newly registered voter!

~~Housing and Urban Development Project~~

Housing and Urban ~~Development~~ Planning Project

Mr. Moreland Smith, an ~~outstanding~~ architect formerly of Montgomery, Alabama, is director of our special project in housing and urban planning. Recognizing that human relations and intergroup relations are profoundly affected by the physical characteristics of a city and by its pattern of space utilzation, this project seeks to make more habitable for ~~all~~ everyone the great cities now growing in the South. Much that Mr. Smith and his associates does, of course, does not lend itself to cooperation with state or local human relations councils. But much of it does. It is hoped that the Urban Planning Project may be a resource for any housing or urban planning questions you may have. Moreover, there ~~is money to~~ are funds which could provide consultants to help meet the program needs of councils.

For example, the project suggested and paid transportation and other expenses for a consultant who helped form a fair housing committee in one city. Another possibility would be ~~consultants to help plan~~ a campaign of neighborhood stabilization in a transition area. (See our pamphlet, "Neighborhood Stabilization") Your group may need assistance to determine factually whether or not there are irregularities in your city's Urban Renewal program -- and to document them if there are. Or, by prearrangement with advice from the Project staff or outside consultants as the case warrants.

with the Urban Planning Project, you might be able to offer the assistance of a human relations-oriented city planner to your municipal officials.

Community Organization Project

Directed by Mr. Al Ulmer, this project seeks to help minority-group communities organize to exercise effectively their due influence on civic processes, particularly as these affect them, and to take advantage of available ~~public~~ federal programs. Mr. Ulmer has worked extensively with several human relations councils and other groups. His many concerns include consumer education, self-help housing (for which government financing can be secured), organization of credit unions, buying cooperatives, block organizing, and many others.

To cite an example, one local human relations council ~~noted~~ discovered that a predominantly Negro public housing project was being allowed to deteriorate, while a traditionally all-white project in the same city was kept in excellent repair. They called on the Community Organization Project to help residents of the neglected project secure equal treatment.

Labor Project

Mr. Emory Via, on a leave of absence from the faculty of the University of Wisconsin, is Director of SRC's Labor Project. ~~His is a program of human relations~~

This project has three main areas of work: (1) labor education for local and state union leaders emphasizing understanding the changing South and labor's responsibilities in the area of civil rights; (2) consultation and liasion work with unions, race relations organizations, and others interested in labor and employment problems; and (3) employment discrimination in terms of public policy formation and in specific remedial programs. Programs vary from an educational conference exclusively for union leaders, to involving union members in activities related to race relations concerns, to assisting in ironing out problems that arise between a union and an agency working in the area of civil rights. The project is interested in knowing of local programs to improve equality in employment and can offer consultative assistance where needed. It sees as one of its important functions bringing thoughtful labor leaders into contact with receptive persons working in human relations.

education aimed at local-level labor leaders. Due to the nature of this program, there is perhaps not as much tie-in with local human relations councils as there is with the other special projects. Certainly, however, the project may be called upon to assist wherever there is a problem, say, of exculsion of Negroes and other non-whites from apprenticeship or from union membership.

Sub. Emory's paragraph

Prison Administration -- Criminal Rehabilitation Project

Mr. John Boone has recently joined our staff as director of a special project in prison administration and criminal rehabilitation. It is a generally assumed but sadly ignored fact that penal policy and conditions in penal institutions in the South are inhumane. Mr. Boone's concern will be to conduct research, including publication of the results, on this problem, and to cultivate the interest of many groups and of the public in this issue.

Since Mr. Boone has begun so recently his program is not yet fully developed. He has already called upon the state council staffs for assistance, however, and it is hoped that both state and local councils will be in touch with him about local penal institutions and rehabilitation problems. The budget for this project includes a sum for consultants.

OTHER INTEREST AREAS

In addition to the program areas in which we have special projects, there are a number ~~inxwhichxwexexxxprxxidxx~~ of our research projects which can provide consultant services to state and local councils incidentally. We also have a couple of special-purpose funds and/an experimental projects ~~xxxwhixh~~ for which we are actively seeking the help and cooperation of local groups.

Fair Employment and Anti-Poverty Programs

Sometimes a local council will be pretty sure that something is wrong in the ~~finidx~~ employment pattern of, let us say, the retail stores of their city, but/will not know how to go about correcting the situation. Or there may be a problem in connection with the "War on Poverty" in your area: no community action agency has been formed; or it has a non-representative composition; or you see a need for an employment training program but do not know how to get a proposal planned and submitted.

In all such situations the Southern Regional Council can provide consultants who will have had some experience in these matters and the technical competence, knowledge of government agencies and personnel, ~~xxdx~~ etc., that you need.

School Integration

SRC has a continuing interest in education and the integration of Southern school systems. In connection with our research on this problem we are able to provide consultant services and some expense money for desegregation problems and efforts. There are the well-known problems of recruiting students to transfer to integrated schools under "freedom of choice" plans and of securing integrated faculties. But more attention needs to be given the less celebrated school integration problems, such as the placement of schools (Is your community's new school bond issue being used to perpetuate segregation?) and almost-exclusive use of all-white-and-middle-class textbooks in the school systems. The SRC will welcome information about and requests for assistance with all such problems.

Welfare Programs

This is another of our research projects. In the budget for it we have anticipated the need for a considerable amount of work at local level on inequities and the ill-effects of standard welfare procedures. For example, many of the most impoverished counties in the South do not participate in the surplus food program of the federal government because local authorities refuse the modest expense of providing storage. Some local groups have successfully waged campaigns to secure this service, and the SRC could pay to have someone experienced in this problem help with similar cases. Or perhaps your groups needs a consultant to help document the results of such unfair (and frequent) policies as those disqualifying a family for assistance unless the father is absent (even though he can find no work).

Student Group Projects

In order to encourage student human relations groups a foundation has provided us funds to assist campus groups with human relations projects. These could be anything: tutorials, projects of recruiting minority groups students for the university, assisting students from low-income families to find scholarships, a lecture series on campus or nearby, etc. It should be remembered, however, that these funds are available to existing student groups for their projects. Under the donor's conditions we cannot ordinarily use them to begin student groups or to maintain their administrative functions.

Paperback Books Project

This year (1966) the SRC is conducting an experiment in distribution of paperback books among low-income people. With more than 40,000 volumes available, we are seeking imaginative ways of making books accessible to people who may not have had access to them before, motivating such people to use books for both information and recreation, and encouraging book ownership. We feel that this experiment can easily be utilized by human relations councils in worthwhile projects.

Your group might, for example, supply books on child-rearing and home economics to parents of a day-nursery in your town. Or the day-nursery itself might need books for the children. If you have or wish to start a study-hall in a slum neighborhood, you could secure dictionaries and other reference books -- and perhaps a shelf of just-for-pleasure books for teenagers and another shelf of books dealing with Negro history and culture. In almost every town and county in the South there are schools with inadequate libraries. Probably the majority of classrooms in grade schools and junior high schools of the region have no class library. Your group might wish to provide books on the history of Negroes in America to all school libraries in your community, or it might wish to provide a basic classroom library to every fifth grade and every eighth grade. Or it might undertake to set up and service a lending shelf in general stores in a rural county.

The possibilities are as endless as your imagination -- and what we want is imaginative proposals for getting books used by people. Guidelines for requesting books will be sent on request. (Incidentally, the books are provide free of charge, including the cost of shipping.)

THE LOUSIANA COUNCIL ON HUMAN RELATIONS

WHAT IS THE LOUISIANA COUNCIL ON HUMAN RELATIONS?

The Louisiana Council on Human Relations is a voluntary association of people drawn together by a common commitment to justice for all and a common desire for understanding and openness among people of the various groups of which our society is composed.

The Council is a private, non-profit organization. It is not a government agency. Anyone who wishes may join to work for better human relations in Louisiana. To this end LCHR cooperates with appropriate government agencies.

WHAT IS THE PURPOSE OF THE LOUISIANA COUNCIL?

As the name suggests, the Council's purpose is to improve human relations. The Louisiana Council on Human Relations works for an atmosphere and environment in which citizens of all races, creeds and colors can live and work in genuine community, decency, and dignity.

WHAT DOES THE LOUISIANA COUNCIL ON HUMAN RELATIONS DO?

The ~~Louisiana~~ Council works mostly through local councils. These are composed of members of the Louisiana Council who, as citizens of their community, are familiar with the community, its human relations problems in all of their complexity, its leaders and potential leaders, and the resources which may be creatively employed.

Using the methods of fact-finding and reporting, education, and negotiation, ~~the~~ LCHR and its local affiliates seek better and equal opportunities for all citizens of Louisiana in education, employment, housing, and health and welfare. ~~The~~ LCHR works for full exercise of the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship by all and for even administration of justice.

The Council maintains a staff and a state office. The staff provides information and resources to local councils. It plans an annual membership meeting and conferences on various human relations concerns as the need arises. Liaison is maintained with many concerned groups and agencies, public and private. The staff is available for conciliation services. It runs a small research and information service, occasionally issues reports on special problems, and helps individuals and groups find needed services in the human relations field. The staff publishes an informative newsletter for members once a month.

IS THE LOUISIANA COUNCIL AFFILIATED WITH ANOTHER ORGANIZATION?

The Louisiana Council is independent and its policies are determined by its Board of Directors, members of the Board are elected at the annual meeting. ~~The staff reports~~

LCHR works closely with the Southern Regional Council. The history of that organization goes back to 1919 when a group of the South's leading church people founded the Commission on Interracial Cooperation to encourage the interchange of ideas and mutual trust between Negroes and white people. The Commission was succeeded by the Southern Regional Council in 1944. Some of its incorporators were Dr. Rufus Clement, President of Atlanta University; the late Dr. Charles S. Johnson, President of Fisk University; Ralph McGill, then editor of the Atlanta Constitution; Bishop Arthur J. Moore of the Methodist Church; and the late Dr. Howard W. Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina.

HOW IS THE LOUISIANA COUNCIL FINANCED?

The Council is funded by membership dues; individual contributions from individuals, and groups, and businesses; and grants from charitable foundations and churches. Some of the donations from foundations are channeled through a grant-in-aid program of the Southern Regional Council.

WHY IS A HUMAN RELATIONS COUNCIL NEEDED? WHY SHOULD I JOIN THE HUMAN RELATIONS COUNCIL?

Because there are a number of ways in which Louisiana is not what the state could be and should be. And the facts show that poor human relations hold Louisiana back.

Let's start with economics. According to the 1960 census the median individual income in the United States was $2,798 -- half the people earned more than that and half earned less. But in Louisiana the dividing line was at $1,967. That is $831 less each year! For the U.S. the median family income is $4,791 per year. For Louisiana it is $3,513. That is $1,278 less each year!

More than 44% of Louisiana's households have incomes below the $3,000 poverty line. These conditions are not good in any way: they are not good for business, they are not good for efficient government, and certainly they are not good for the persons who are the victims.

And it's a human relations problem! Of white households in Louisiana, 33.5% are in poverty; of Negro households, 72.2% are in poverty! Of Louisiana's labor force as a whole, 6.1% are out of work, which is nearly twice the national average. But among Negro workers the rate is 9.7% while it is only 4.2% among white workers. So the progress of the whole state and everyone in it is impeded by faulty human relations, -- by prejudice and discrimination.

Every effect has its cause -- and unemployment and low income can be traced to poor education. Louisiana has the highest percentage of illiterates in the nation: 6.3% In 1965-66 one-half of Louisiana's draftees failed pre-induction mental tests! Only three states had a higher rate of failures. Only 67.4% of those Louisiana students entering high school in 1961-62 graduated in 1964-65, which places Louisiana in the top one-fourth of the states on the drop-out scale.

Again, it is a human relations problem. In 1963 (the last year for which figures are available) Louisiana spent $260.20 to instruct white pupils, only $214.1 to instruct Negro children. In that year the average classroom of white children had 28.9 pupils in it, while there were 32.2 Negro children in each of their classes. Statistics also show that Negro teachers are paid less than white teachers with comparable training in Louisiana.

And why are Negroes short-changed in Louisiana? In part because they have traditionally been denied full participation in the processes of democracy. 83% of eligible white Louisianians are registered to vote; only 42% of eligible Negroes in Louisiana are registered.

Many other facts could be cited. But they all point to the same ~~thing~~ truth: Louisiana has serious human relations problems, and there is every reason for an organization in which concerned citizens can work to effect smoothly the changes which must inevitably be made.

HOW DO YOU JOIN THE LOUISIANA COUNCIL ON HUMAN RELATIONS?

Simply fill out the application form and mail it to the state office or give it to a local council officer. You may send the membership dues by check, cash or money order -- or ask that you be billed later.

To: Directors of State Councils on Human Relations

From: Ed Stanfield and Emory Via

Listed below are three suggestions for possible State Council programs which could be run in cooperation with SRC's Labor Program. Would you look them over and give your reactions or expressions of interest to one of us when you are in Atlanta. for the Directors' meeting.

1. A project to assist in the enforcement of the newly amended minimum wage law. The coverage of the law and the benefits it guarantees will be improved. Many workers will not know that they are covered or will not know how to proceed in the enforcement of their rights. Many employers, Similarly will be slow in realizing the impact of the law on them. This project will have to await the final passage of the law and the preparation of a guideline for action. However, it could be of substantial benefit to low income people. It would be a direct and appreciated service. It could be a program run almost completely by volunteers and might be an excellent project for college youth looking for a beneficial project with tangible results. A briefing conference could be held with SRC arranging for the experts. Basically, such a program would supplement federal efforts. But it could assure speedy and fair enforcement. It offers advantages in building some meaningful bridges between low income groups and human relations efforts.

2. A project to assist in ending discrimination in apprentice training. We could offer a variety of consultative services. A determination needs to be made of actual local practice and how many Negroes are involved in aprrentice training. Similarly, some assessment is needed how the main institutional elements in apprentice training will respond to ~~a/progra~~ a project encouraging Negro entry into their programs. Remember, of course, that a good bit of law and administrative regulation is on the side of fairness. Thirdly, Negro youngsters who are qualified by age and education need to be located and motivated to participate in such training. A major part of such a program is to provide realistic, preparatory training so the youngsters (ages 18-25) can score well on entry tests. A good bit of experience on this is available. Again, this is a program that can be carried out, with some expert advice, by volunteers. Not too many. They need to be qualified people. The main element in this ~~whole~~ proposal is the location, training, [redacted] motiviation component. The other determinations(extent of Negro participation and attitude of the institutions involved) ~~is~~ are for background purposes. Assistance can be offered in developing that information, too.

A specific proposal would be to convene a small working conference of people ~~fro~~ from one metropolitan area. ~~who are interested in such a program~~. It should include those knowledgable in apprentice problems and training as well as persons from your organization[redacted] and others who would be expected to take the lead in program execution. Emory Via would ~~like~~ want to consult with you in detail prior to ~~the~~ invitations being ~~made to such a conference~~ extended. SRC would provide the expert consultants ~~the~~ for such a meeting and ~~perhaps~~ assist ~~in~~ or cover the other costs for a ~~1~~ one or two day program. We would not envision travel or room costs ~~being incurred~~ since the meeting ~~would~~ would be restricted to one city.

3. An off-the record conference between civil rights leaders and labor leaders. In some cases selected other leaders would also be involved. The format and invitees will have to be agreed on in advance between the Labor Program and the State Council. Such a conference would encourage individuals and their organizations to get acquainted on a serious level. It would uncover mutual, practical interests. It would air, constructively, the differences and miunderstandings that may have developed between civil rights advocates and the labor movement. The conference could be area or statewide. SRC would (a) advise on program, (b) work to secure labor participation, (c) provide ~~the~~ ~~of the~~ outside expertise, and (d) underwrite ~~some~~ much of the related costs to the meeting.

FROM: Ed Stanfield

The state council directors keep citing instances of their discovering only by accident that the S.R.C. is aiding a group or project within their states. They find this disconcerting because (1) people who do not understand the autonomous nature of the state councils assume that the directors have been informed by SRC and (2) the directors, stumbling across one project, suppose that there might be two or three others involving people they would like to know and be in touch with.

Could we make it standard operation procedure to inform each state council director when we are conducting a project, aiding a local group with a project, giving financial aid, etc., within his bailiwick? There will be times, of course, when some delicate matter will require, in your judgment, an exception to the standard procedure I am suggesting; I am sure the council directors would have no objection to that. A carbon copy of a key letter,-- such as a letter of transmittal for a grant, or a letter agreeing to a speaking engagement, or the like -- marked "for information only", would be a big help.

For my part, I will ~~take pains to~~ ask the state council directors to remember that information concerning any such involvement of S.R.C. is only to keep them informed and, in some instances, to give them names for eventual contact and that it does not call for action on their part unless specifically requested. They will understand, I think, that in many cases (such as work with conservative labor groups or city officials) great discretion is required.

Copies to state council directors.

WHITE & NON-WHITE FARM OPERATORS
NUMBERS & PERCENTAGE OF CHANGE, 1959-1964

South Carolina
Florida
Mississippi

Alabama
Louisiana
Tennessee

In South Carolina the total number of nonwhite operated farms (excluding managers) dropped from 30,977 in 1959 to 19,602 in 1964, a decline of 36.7 percent. White operated farms dropped by 23.0 percent (47,177 to 36,348) in the same period. Among Negroes the rate of decline was 23.7 percent for full owners; 22.9 percent decline for whites. For Negro part owners, the decline was 23.6 percent; among white part owners the decline was 6.4 percent. Negro tenants in South Carolina declined by 48.0 percent, while white tenants declined by 30.7 percent.

In Florida the total number of nonwhite operated farms (excluding managers) dropped from 3,668 in 1959 to 2,820 in 1964, a decline of 23.0 percent. White operated farms dropped by 11.9 percent (41,416 to 36,480) in the same period. Among Negroes the rate of decline was 26.1 percent for full owners; 12.0 percent decline for whites. For Negro part owners, the decline was not so great at 9.7 percent; among white part owners, 7.8 percent. Negro tenants in Florida declined by 26.3 percent, while white tenants only declined by 7.2 percent.

In Mississippi the total number of nonwhite operated farms (excluding managers) dropped from 55,369 in 1959 to 37,701 in 1964, a decline of 31.9 percent. White operated farms dropped by 14.1 percent (82,719 to 71,032) in the same period. Among Negroes the rate of decline was 18.6 percent for full owners; 11.8 percent decline for whites. For Negro part owners, the decline was 1.9 percent; among white part owners the decline was 3.3 percent. Negro tenants in Mississippi declined by 43.4 percent, while white tenants declined by 40.2 percent. The heavy decline among Negro tenants now leaves Mississippi with slightly more Negro farm owners (full and part owners) than tenants.

In Alabama the total number of nonwhite operated farms (excluding managers) dropped from 29,234 in 1959 to 20,941 in 1964, a decline of 28.4 percent. White operated farms dropped by 17.4 percent (86,522 to 71,362) in the same period. Among Negroes the rate of decline was 20.0 percent for full owners; 11.8 percent decline for whites. For Negro part owners, the decline was 12.0 percent; among white part owners the decline was 6.6 percent. Negro tenants in Alabama declined by 37.4 percent, while white tenants declined by 42.2 percent. The decline in Negro tenants now leaves Alabama (like Mississippi) with slightly more Negro farm owners (full and part owners) than tenants.

In Louisiana the total number of nonwhite operated farms (excluding managers) dropped from 17,679 in 1959 to 12,290 in 1964, a decline of 30.5 percent. White operated farms dropped by 12.0 percent (56,735 to 49,918) in the same period. Among Negroes the rate of decline was 19.9 percent for full owners; 14.6 percent decline for whites. For Negro part owners, the decline was 4.6 percent; among white part owners the decline was 13.2 percent. Negro tenants in Louisiana declined by 43.0 percent, while white tenants declined by 24.1 percent.

In Tennessee the total number of nonwhite operated farms (excluding managers) dropped from 15,037 in 1959 to 10,654 in 1964, a decline of 29.1 percent. White operated farms dropped by 14.2 percent (142,635 to 122,434) in the same period. Among Negroes the rate of decline was 21.9 percent for full owners; 11.1 percent decline for whites. For Negro part owners, the decline was 12.8 percent; among white part owners the decline was 7.5 percent. Negro tenants in Tennessee declined by 35.1 percent; while white tenants declined by 33.0 percent.

We are planning a three-day staff meeting in Washington of NSF and RAP field representatives to meet with various federal agencies and officials in order to become thoroughly familiar with the programs, regulations and procedures of these agencies so that we can be better informed and more effective in helping to develop projects and programs sponsored by these agencies in our respective states.

Some of the agencies with which we will be meeting and subjects to be discussed follow.

OEO: Community Action Programs and Title 3-B.
USDL: Office of Employment Security and OMERT.
USDA: Farmers Home Administration, Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, Soil Conservation Service.
HEW: Elementary and Secondary School Act.
DHUD: Federal Housing Programs.

Time permitting, we also hope to have briefing sessions with the compliance officers of these agencies and with the United States Commission on Civil Rights.

This is the first of a number of staff training meetings that we hope to arrange from time to time. Other meetings will be rotated in the states where NSF and RAP field representatives are stationed.

I hope that you will make it possible for your RAP representative to attend this meeting which is tentatively scheduled in Washington for April 13, 14 and 15.

Further details will be sent to you and your RAP representatives as soon as I hear that these dates are convenient for all concerned.

I would appreciate hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Dear Paul:

I am very pleased to be able to advise you formally that the Board of Directors of The Aaron E. Norman Fund, Inc. decided at a recent meeting to make a grant of $10,000 to the Southern Regional Council in support of the rural development work being conducted by the Southern Regional Council in co-operation with the National Sharecroppers Fund. This grant is to be administered by you and used to cover certain expenses of NSF's Southern regional office substantially as follows: $3,600 for travel, $1,200 for conferences and staff meetings, and $5,200 for a secretary-assistant to Jac Wasserman. Enclosed is a check of this Fund for $10,000 in payment of said grant.

I would appreciate your sending me, in April, 1967, a brief report on the use made of this grant.

I very much enjoyed seeing you during my brief stay in Atlanta and hope that I will see you again in the near future.

Ed Stanfield informs me that RAP representatives are expected to attend the meeting of the State Human Relations Directors at SRC's office in Atlanta on April 26th and 27th.

Your coming to Atlanta for this meeting will give me the opportunity of meeting with you as a group to review our program, to discuss new projects, and to work out reporting procedures that are acceptable to everyone concerned.

My plan is for us to meet after the adjournment of the meeting of the State Directors on the 27th, roughly from about 2 to 5:30 p.m. and then re-convene at 9 a.m. on Thursday the 28th and continue until about 1 p.m. This will allow you sufficient time to get home for dinner.

We had tentatively planned for RAP and NSF field representatives to meet in Washington for three days, between April 12th and 15th but found that those days conflicted with a meeting of the CCAP which Fay Bennett and I plan to attend, and which would also prevent many of the other people we wanted to meet from being with us.

We have decided, therefore, to schedule this meeting at a later date and you will be informed as soon as arrangements and are approved by your State Directors.

I have suggested to Fay Bennett that since the RAP field representatives will be in Atlanta on April 26th and 27th that we also bring in our NSF representatives so that we can all meet together starting the afternoon of the 27th. If this suggestion is approved, we will then request that you stay an additional day, until the late afternoon of Friday, April 29th. We will then probably also ask some of the people from the Atlanta regional offices of the federal agencies to meet with us on Friday.

As I will be in Alabama all of this week and will not return to the office until April 4th, I will not be able to confirm whether only the RAP representatives will be meeting with me, or whether we will have a joint meeting with the NSF representatives and Fay Bennett until some time later that week.

I have been very busy this past week and may not have had the opportunity of acknolwedging the reports received from some RAP representatives. If you haven't heard from me this past week, I did not consider that there was any urgent reason for writing and will catch up with my correspondence after my return from Alabama.

NOTE TO STATE DIRECTORS: You are also invited to attend and participate at my meeting with the RAP representatives.

This is to confirm arrangements for a joint meeting of RAP and NSF field representatives to be held in Atlanta starting at 2 p.m. on Wednesday, April 27th. We plan to meet until about 5:30 p.m. that day, all day Thursday and until about 1 p.m. on Friday, April 29th.

Our meetings will be held at the Atlantan Hotel, 111 Luckie St., (one block from the Dinkler) starting at 2 p.m. on Wednesday, April 27th in Parlor B, Mezzanine floor.

The primary purpose of this meeting is to have an overall review and discussion of our program, to discuss new projects, exchange experiences and for NSF and RAP representatives to get acquainted.

If there are some special subjects about which you would like to have further information, or if there are particular problems you would like to have discussed, please write me so that I can include them on the agenda.

I will try to get a tentative agenda in your hands some time during the week of April 20th.

TO: State Directors

FROM: Jac Wasserman

The recent staff meeting of RAP and NSF representatives in Atlanta indicated, I believe, that we need to have such training sessions more often. We were only able to cover a few of the items on our agenda and were not able to go into any of the subjects in depth. We also planned to have each of the field men report on the work they were doing in their states and to have them report on how they initiated projects in their states; on their relations with state and local officials, etc., but did not have time for it at this meeting.

We have tentatively scheduled another staff meeting for June 21-23, probably in Atlanta, at which time we hope to cover a great many other areas of our work with rural people and organizations. We expect to have some of the Southern Rural Training Project Staff participate at this meeting to give us the benefit of their experience in developing various non-agricultural government programs in the fields of basic education, vocational and on-the-job training programs, etc.

I would appreciate your informing me whether June 21-23 would be a satisfactory time for such a meeting and whether your RAP representative will be able to attend. If those dates conflict with other activity scheduled in your state, please advise whether June 28-30 would be a better time to hold this meeting. We hope that you will also be able to attend these sessions to familiarize yourself with the programs, to participate in the discussions and give us the benefit of your ideas and suggestions for the kind of programs most needed in your state.

I will write you again to confirm the dates after I have heard from the other State Directors.

TO: RAP Representatives

FROM: Jac Wasserman

I assume that your State Director has informed you that we have planned another staff meeting of RAP and NSF representatives to be held at the Atlantan Hotel in Atlanta, starting at 7 P. M. on June 21, through Thursday June 23. Room reservations have been made for you at the Atlantan Hotel.

I will be sending you a tentative agenda early next month. If you have any suggestions regarding subjects that you would like to have discussed and included on the agenda, please let me hear from you as soon as possible. You will have another opportunity to make additional suggestions after you receive the proposed agenda.

I am sending you a packet of printed material under separate cover which contains a very informative booklet on Farmer Associations in Tennessee; Mutual Self-Help Guidlines issued by FHA; and a press release from HEW on opportunities for colleges and universities to establish seminars for community leaders in such fields as poverty, health, housing, and employment. Also, Resolutions and Recommendations of a Citizens Action Assembly on Health and Welfare Services in Georgia; and a clipping from the Southern Courier with a story on the credit union started by Lewis Black in Greensboro, Alabama.

Please review this material carefully and see in what way you can apply some of this information to the work that you are doing in your state. Negro colleges, in particular, should be encouraged to apply for Title I funds for "programs directed toward solution of community problems."

We have definitely scheduled a staff meeting of RAP and NSF field representatives, starting at 7 P. M. on Tuesday, June 21, through Thursday June 23, at the Atlantan Hotel on Luckie Street. We will be meeting in Parlor B on the Mezzanine, which is the same room used for our last meeting. I hope that there will not be any problem about your RAP representative attending. Please also advise me if you are planning to attend and if you would like me to arrange a room reservation for you at the Atlantan Hotel. I will also make room reservations for RAP and NSF representatives at the Atlantan, unless I am informed to the contrary.

A tenative agenda will be sent to you and your RAP representative early in June, at which time we will solicit your suggestions for other subjects that you would like to have discussed at this meeting.

Following is a list of federally assisted recreation facilities in your state. I have not been able to get the local addresses of these facilities but they can be obtained from each of the FHA county offices mentioned. As these facilities were funded after passage of the Civil Rights Act (Title 6), it should be determined whether they are open to the public and if so, whether Negro citizens are making use of those facilities. It may be that the Negro citizens of those counties do not know that these facilities are supposed to be available to all citizens and this information should be relayed to them so that the facilities can be tested. If any citizen encounters any difficulty in using these facilities, it should be called to the attention of the FHA county supervisor, the State Director of FHA, and to Mr. William Seabron, Assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, USDA, Washington, D. C. A copy of your complaint, as well as a full report should also be sent to me.

Please bear in mind that the facilities described may have been established for either personal or public use. It is only where the facilities are intended for public use (with a charge for theuse of the facilities) that the owner must be in compliance.

INTRODUCTION

In 1960, the Southern Regional Council, the Southeastern Office, American Friends Service Committee, and the Department of Racial and Cultural Affairs, National Council of the Churches of Christ, published a report on five years of violent reaction to the 1954 Supreme Court school decision, "Intimidation, Reprisal and Violence in the South's Racial Crisis." Since then, the Council and others have continued to record and report this most disgraceful aspect of the South's struggle to overcome its worst mistakes. With the same sense of sadness and urgency, this report continues the story—with its warning to the nation that violence has not abated, and that the miracle of non-retaliation from Negroes cannot be expected to continue.

Assistance of the American Friends Service Committee in preparation of research materials for this report is acknowledged. Research and writing of the project was by Mrs. Glenda Bartley of the Southern Regional Council research staff.

The following paragraph from the 1960 report is fully applicable to the situation six years later:

> Finally, this is not a comprehensive survey of southern reactions . . . It describes only their angry, violent side. Another accounting could be given of patience, responsibility, courage, and good will by both Negroes and whites. Though this aspect of the South is not in view in the report, it is an authentic and undimmed face of the South, to which each of the sponsoring agencies has paid tribute more than once. But we feel an obligation to call attention to the dangers posed by the record that follows—dangers for which all of us, through silence or inaction, must share the responsibility.

PART I

The South's Temper, 1964-1966

As Negro children began what some newspapers termed "massive" integration of southern public schools in September, 1965, the nation was surprised that Southerners accepted the change in a peaceful manner. The truth is that conditions in the South were neither integrated nor peaceful. Between five and six per cent of the region's 3,014,025 Negro school-age children attended classes with whites, and often these children and their parents paid a very high price for the experience. Men and women who were already desperately poor were evicted from sharecropper's cabins or tenant farms. Many without the training for good jobs lost the meager ones they had held for years. Some were beaten and shot at. Others saw their children abused and imprisoned. Yet the headlines continued to reassure the nation that "School Integration Continues to Spread Quietly Across the South."

There are several reasons for the nation's misunderstanding of the South's condition.

Passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964 indicated to many whites that the Negro's problem was now largely solved and, with restrictions barring him from participation in American life removed, he would disappear into the mainstream and quit pestering their consciences.

Immediate effects of the 1964 law were felt only in the area of public accommodations, giving middle class Negroes access to peripheral trappings of the white man's world, which were at best merely a symbol of the law's intent. The fall and winter of 1964 confirmed the fact that many urban and some rural public accommodations were desegregated.

Then, in the spring of 1965 the Office of Education announced plans to bring southern schools into compliance with the law. Virtually all districts filed plans with the federal bureau stating that various grades were open to both races, usually on a "freedom of choice" basis. Somehow the fact that in the immediate past cities had submitted to token integration only after lengthy court battles was overlooked, and it was assumed that federal money and southern honor would do the trick in the small towns and country areas.

So, when school opened in the fall, little communities like Ruby, South Carolina, which completely desegregated all twelve grades, and Philadelphia, Mississippi, which admitted a few Negro children without a riot, received national attention. The impression was false and the apathy was national, not southern. The old patterns of resistance were still being employed; wherever weakness was found in federal enforcement it would be exploited.

Soon, the federal government discovered that freedom of choice in many communities was a cruel misnomer. Negro parents who filled out transfer forms for their children (from which the Office of Education deduced the number of children in desegregated schools) often changed their minds. In many cases schools reported peacefully desegregated on the first day of classes had only a fraction of the children who had signed letters of intent—usually because the superintendent had advised Negro parents to keep their children home or send them to the Negro school until any possibility of trouble abated. Once school opened "without incident" the matter was no longer "news." Many people subjected to violence, intimidation, or economic reprisal live in isolated rural areas or small communities, and the "news" did not get out. It spoke its own language, however, to the local Negroes.

Rationale of Retaliation

At the same time the nation was deluding itself about southern school desegregation, it was ignoring the economic and occasionally violent reprisals which followed in the wake of voter registration drives.

The Voting Rights Law of 1965 was the first supplement to the Civil Rights Act. Again, once the law was passed, it seemed the issue was settled. Law created fact, and all those people for whom the Selma march spoke would now be citizens. That hundreds of people in Black Belt counties in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana were out of work or off the land because they registered to vote was hardly noticed. The deeper implications of joblessness, poverty, and frustration attached to this evidence of economic dependence were largely ignored.

The nation also has regarded violence as a characteristic of all the former Confederate states. This is an illusion. Violence has for several years been largely confined to the Deep South, and there generally to Alabama, Mississippi, north and delta Louisiana, and southwest Georgia. Occasional outbursts in the peripheral South, Texas, Arkansas, Florida, north Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, North and South Carolina, have been isolated incidents and not a manifestation of organized resistance. Though cities like Birmingham are hardly distinguishable from the surrounding countryside, the hard-core violent resistance areas are largely rural.

Here registrars know the Negroes who try to register and the jobs they hold on the plantations they "belong" to. A superintendent knows the mother hopefully filling out a transfer form for her child is a maid in the house just down the street. There also is, as one Mississippian put it, the "lack of a public sector"—a place where both races have traditionally met in an impersonal manner. In cities the buses may have had segregated seating customs but Negro and white at least rode on the same bus bound for destinations unknown to each other. The city affords (and in the case of the Negro, demands) anonymity. In the small town and rural areas, any contact between the races is a personal one, and so more painful when one tries to change patterns.

Perhaps this partially explains the real personal grudge many rural whites have against Negroes. It is not just against those who are, for reasons unknown to whites, out in the streets demonstrating for what they choose to call freedom, but against those who aren't. For those who continue to crop for Mr. John and stay out of trouble, they feel contempt. True, the wrath of whites is almost always directed at those Negroes who are trying to change things, but relationships also deteriorate with those who do not join the effort. So there is no foundation of respect, anywhere. Along with this is the feeling on the part of the white man that he is trapped, just as the Negro is trapped, in a situation over which he has no control. He reads and hears daily that only the Negro receives federal help for his predicament, and southern education is sufficiently deficient that he has no facts with which to refute this.

Having swapped the ballot for racial shibboleths, he sees democracy once again passing him by; this time as a vehicle for the very people he sacrificed so much to "keep down." Feeling beleaguered, cornered, and contemptuous, such whites permitted or abetted continued efforts to use legal, economic, and ultimately, violent methods of denying a whole people self-respect.

Plight of the Poor

Heightening the frustrations of all the rural South is the fact that cotton continues to decline as a significant portion of agricultural production. Again the peripheral South is different, having already begun to diversify its farm production and move toward industrialization in the 1940's. The Deep South—Black Belt Alabama and the Mississippi Delta particular y —have been much slower in abandoning cotton. Yet here, too, unmarketable short staple cotton and curtailed allotments, cattle, pine trees—along with mechanization have pushed people off the land. As a single staple economy wrenches itself toward a mature, diversified one, the need for unskilled labor sharply increased.

In the traditional sense these people are beyond the definition of cybernation—men and women whose one skill is bending over a hoe or a cotton stalk, who have been trained in this capacity since childhood, whose schools close in planting and pickin' time to resume in "slack" seasons. They themselves are products of the plantation system—of a feudalism that transcends the old manorial concept and becomes almost a familial relationship, with the plantation manager, the Man, a patriarch. That this patriarch might be benign and allow his docile children to remain on the land long after their usefulness has gone is often true. But once they threaten his dominion, he punishes them simply by removing them, cutting them off from their inheritance, which is the land, the hoe, and the cotton stalk.

Many of the disinherited are like the 82-year-old man whose mother was born a slave on the Wilcox County farm he was forced to leave. In his new home without water or light, he will live by "growing some corn." In West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, a woman, blind, crippled, born a slave, will live in a shanty with relatives. Another man and his wife, living on $33 a month social security, are homeless after registering to vote. Driven off the land they had farmed for decades, these people's resolve was best expressed in one old woman's pathetically stubborn defiance: "Our only sin was wanting to be citizens . . . . Would I go back to my old house if I would promise not to vote? Chile, I wouldn't promise not to vote if they gave me the house."

Retaliation against younger families began in September and usually hinged on their attempts to exercise "freedom of choice" in school desegregation. During October, November, and December the cause was voter registration. The crops were in and the people, old men and women, young families, had to go.

A family in Bolivar County, Mississippi, which had always increased its cash yield by following the mechanical cotton picker to glean what it missed, watched the "picker" drag a disc, plowing their cotton under. The truck which used to pick women up to take them to the fields "didn't stop at their houses any more." Men who had held jobs for over ten years suddenly were demoted or fired. A man lost his job with the Alabama Power Company after enrolling his child in a "desegregated" school; the county was holding up his unemployment check. A Thomas County, Georgia, man lost his job and his land after transferring his children to a "white" school. Women lost their jobs as domestics and their husbands could no longer find work as handymen. Many, like an evicted sharecropper who said of the plantation owner, "He's had a mechanical picker since '55, and he has lots of people who ain't registered working," forfeited their livelihoods for their challenge to paternalism.

All over the old recalcitrant part of the South families lost their land and their homes for registering to vote or for transferring their children. More than a hundred families in Wilcox and Lowndes Counties, Alabama, at least a hundred people in West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, and uncounted numbers of families in Bolivar, Issaquena, Sharkey, and Washington Counties, Mississippi, were put off the land. Though many of these evictions were punitive, reduced acreage allotments under the Agricultural Act of 1965 were to take a far greater toll. An estimated 4,706 seasonal workers in the Mississippi Delta alone would not be needed in 1966. These people will join the already staggering number of unemployed in the state. Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman in December, 1965, stated that "the Mississippi welfare agency estimates that as many as 500,000 more needy persons will be added to the regular winter case load of about 300,000." Mississippi's total population is only 2,178,174. That 800,000 (or 36.7%) of this number were scheduled to receive some form of public assistance indicated the magnitude of the problem.

Tent cities in Issaquena and Washington Counties in the Delta and in Lowndes County, Alabama, housed the dispossessed. In one of the coldest winters in Delta memory people huddled inside the tents, unable to find work, waiting for federal food commodities that would hold off hunger while they tried to keep from freezing. Too many times the food got tangled in red tape and the hope of its arrival turned to bitterness.

Secretary Freeman had assured the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches that money would be available "soon" for Operation Help (an experimental commodities program set up under contract between state officials, the Office of Economic Opportunity, and the Department of Agriculture).

A spokesman for inhabitants of a tent city near Tribbett, Mississippi, recounted more than a year's frustrating efforts to get commodities distributed to additional poverty-stricken people in the state. Each time a private organization within a county offered to finance and staff distribution centers for the food, the U. S. Dept. of Agriculture referred the plan to the Mississippi Welfare Department, which substituted an alternate program. Immediately after the state bureau set up a commodity program in one such county the Department of Agriculture found it necessary to send an agent to investigate charges of discrimination. In another, the Food Stamp program was substituted. Food stamps must be purchased; a dollar stamp will buy six dollars worth of food (the figure represents the national average); so the very poor were not helped at all by the program. Finally a state-wide plan was initiated under which the Welfare Department was to get 24 million dollars worth of additional commodities from the Agriculture Department and 1.6 million dollars from the Office of Economic Opportunity to distribute food to 500,000 people for six months.

In the old system conditions under which vital food commodities were distributed, when they were distributed, were described by a Delta woman:

> "To live, we got to go out and chop cotton for $3 a day, maybe two or three days a week. At the end of cotton picking, we gets the same for picking the scrap the machines leave. Then in November when they start qualifying you for the commodities, they say you got to find out how many people you worked for and get them to sign for you as being poor. If they don't feel like signing, like maybe they don't like you for civil rights activities, you don't get commodities. But you still poor, whether the white boss says so or not."

In many rural areas county welfare or other administrative boards have refused to accept federal food and money. In Washington County, Mississippi, where the greatest number of people are off the land and out of work, the board of supervisors refused additional government surplus commodities because (in the words of a Delta newspaper) "the program would probably benefit primarily Negroes, and landowners are said to feel they would have more difficulty in getting spring labor if commodities were not cut off in March."

Earlier in that county, in desperation, a group of about 50 of the dispossessed had left their tents and taken up residence briefly in an abandoned air base near Greenville. This adroit demonstration brought the nation's attention at last to the plight of Mississippi's poor Negroes generally, or at least to the surface of their problems.

The federal government responded in its traditional manner—by, as a spokesman for the Office of Economic Opportunity's Rural Task Force said, "putting the problem in the same category with Watts, trying to head off trouble." It undertook a labor survey in the Delta and activated the long-promised, dormant 25.6 million dollar surplus program in the state, "the most massive food distribution program since the depression." If the commodities program were stop-gap, presaging more constructive action, it would be welcome relief. But there was the impression that thirty years after the depression, federal remedies for hunger and broken lives and hopelessness had not changed. People who needed the best, most imaginative programs society could muster still got commodities—subsistence—"the dole."

There was not much chance that such palliatives could do more than keep the mass of people alive while buying off moderate leadership. Caesar's old desire for fat folks around him had not changed.

As a matter of policy the poverty program brings together in local administrative agencies whites and Negroes of all classes. While this is perhaps a noble blueprint intention, it has the effect in such a state as Mississippi of putting intransigent whites in a position to block the kind of change which the program is designed to facilitate.

The poverty program had indicated a shift in emphasis on the part of the federal government toward solutions to the fundamental problem of dependence, of economic vulnerability. It came before massive demonstrations demanded it. But it has not as yet reached those who most desperately need it, and its effect has been in all too many instances one of heightening frustrations. This adds another dimension to the problem of government's role in the Negro's struggle: In the event of massive protest or outright riots by poor people the government's traditional approach of enacting a law that answers the surface needs and quiets the protesters will be less easy, since such a law already exists. So again—the need for strong enforcement and implementation is at the crux of the problem. A reappraisal of this essential aspect of government programs as they affect the Negro community is vital if the nation is to have an answer for outbursts such as Watts which seem almost inevitable in the immediate future.

The poverty program had promised to do more than "dole"—to allow poor people themselves to launch an attack on poverty by means of increasing their own training and exposing themselves to at least a smattering of middle class culture and values. Yet it has failed in many instances to provide even the stop-gap measures such as commodities to fill immediate needs of those who are desperately poor. Its effect was to deepen the disillusionment of people like those in Mississippi who said:

> "You know, we ain't dumb, even if we are poor. We need jobs. We need food. We need houses. But even with the poverty program we ain't got nothin' but needs . . . See, you can only accept poor peoples by being poor and really know what being poor is like. And all this stuff about poverty programs and federal funds, that's out for poor peoples. We were looked upon as just a civil rights demonstration [at the Greenville air base]. But really we were there demanding and waiting and asking that these things be brought there to fill some desperate needs. And we was asking that the poor peoples be accepted as they stood. And instead of getting what we was asking we got the whole air force troopers in on us. To me, that's our government."

> "I feel that the federal government have proven that it don't care about poor people. Everything that we have asked for through these years has been handed down on paper. It's never been a reality.
> "We the poor people of Mississippi is tired. We're tired of it so we're going to build for ourselves, because we don't have a government that represents us."

Self-Help

To a few, "building for ourselves" had gone beyond the immediacy of a tent city to establishment of cooperatives aimed at breaking the chains of economic dependence. Cooperatives, producing everything from candles to furniture, handbags, quilts and clothing, faced many difficulties. Tools, teachers, and money were badly needed. Without capital, and long-term capital at that, most cooperatives were doomed. Outlets for products were hard to find; often they were either "sympathy" markets which are quickly exhausted or sophisticated ones that require a broad financial base for participation. Cooperatives which foster communal arrangements run the risk of becoming another Koinonia (an integrated communal farm in south Georgia which was under siege for several years). The co-ops held out hope for a way to those desperately in need of it and so were in danger of increasing bitterness and frustration if the effort failed.

At the same time, they also fostered a spirit of organization that does not die with the failure.

Self-respect on the part of Negroes is at the heart of all efforts to improve their status within the community and the nation. For people who have lost all hope and confidence (and this would include many whose pathetically small educational experience has stifled verbalization rather than enhanced it) self-respect can come from another's interest and respect. That civil rights organizations stress the beauty and worth of each individual has had a large part in instilling self-respect in people whom society as a whole has literally forgotten. To men and women who have had their identities absorbed into a system more ruthlessly dehumanizing than modern industrial society, being valued by another person can be a real beginning toward self-respect. The co-ops have much the same effect, producing tangible objects that are sources of pride. In a real sense the Tribbett tent city, set up to provide homes for striking Delta laborers, while failing to provide a permanent solution to the complex problems of jobless, homeless people, was a rallying point for all the Delta's dispossessed. All across the South, aggressive county "Improvement Leagues" and "Christian Associations" are evidence of Negroes' new awareness of their power.

Half a century after Booker T. Washington's "self-improvement" plan, the poorest Negro's chance of sharing in the South's "new prosperity" was so remote that even the hard-won ballot was often a cruel joke. If the voter's league succeeded in conquering white dominance and taking over a county—what then? Where would the money come from to pave the roads candidates promised would be paved?

To desegregate rural schools may solve the immediate problem, but those schools remain the worst in the nation. Many rural counties do not now afford the minimum matching funds states require. It is prosaic but nonetheless true that nascent efforts toward tax equalization may be the most far-reaching gain for rural Negroes yet devised. But virtually every tax case must be fought long and bitterly in the courts, holding in abeyance any hope that Wilcox, Lowndes, and like counties can be governed at all.

In struggling with these problems newly formed Negro organizations are confronted with the old vestiges of protest, of negativism, and with a growing bitterness and real alienation from American life. Woven into these organizations is a new radicalism which, on the surface, wants no part of the white man's consensus, daring the Negro to go his own way—to, as Charles Silberman said in Fortune (November, 1965), "stop pounding on the door" and, in effect, "tear the house down." Some groups are torn between the tempting chauvinism of their own political slate, which proves their strength, and merger with white "moderates" who are willing to yield to the most superficial of their demands in order to manipulate that power. This presents Negroes with a dilemma that must be faced by the nation as a whole.

The dilemma is an American reflection of a world-wide pattern in which the poor, colored, economically underdeveloped, rural world is seeking fundamental changes in the face of the status quo-oriented world of rich, white, urbanized Europe and North America—all fostered by industrialization, creating "haves" in cities, by-passing shabby "have-nots" on the land. Until recently people in the countryside were never organized.

The Populists came closest in the past, close enough to put a permanent fear into southern Bourbons—fear that lower class whites and Negroes might actually cooperate to throw off Bourbon rule. That fear operates today. So far there has been little actual political cooperation between the races, except in border states like Texas where the Negro population is comparatively small and increasingly urban. There labor, Negroes, Latin Americans and white liberals struggle toward an effective coalition. But Texas has a degree of primitive political sophistication that removes it from the southern arena. In the South generally the lower class white has absorbed enough of the shibboleths, looks forward to a share in the "new prosperity," and finds such psychological value in feeling superior to the Negro that it has been difficult to forge a class awareness. He may, however, come to vote with Negroes on some issues without really meaning to. These people still feel a link with the upper class power structure because of color, rejecting alliance with the Negro for economic reasons. That this further isolates the Negro goes without saying.

Answering Anger

Urban Negroes are cut off from all but the most impersonal contact with whites. They are crowded into slums in the city's core surrounded by housing project palisades, ringed by white suburbia. Until very recently urban Negroes have been poorly organized, venting their frustration on other Negroes. Now radicalism of the same tonal quality as the rural brand has permeated city organizations, directing the rebellion outward. In the past the only attention-getter that produced results was demonstrations. But outside of isolated picketing of a slum-lord's home or sporadic rent strikes, there is a troublesome realization that the negativism of protest can only call attention to the problem and has little to do with fundamental solutions. In one large city slum, civil rights groups and unaffiliated interested citizens have worked for more than a year to organize effective self-help projects that reach people untouched by the poverty program. The efforts met with limited success until early February when an old man froze to death in an unheated shack. Out of this and other instances of people wretchedly cold, hungry, and hopeless came picketing and rent strikes, and the threat that the slum could become another Watts.

Young liberal idealists who have worked to organize the community have themselves been challenged by the new mood of anger and rebellion. People evicted for participating in a rent strike gathered around a campfire which was the only warmth for families living in hastily erected tents. Out of this meeting came the new voice, the new challenge and the old weapon: "Why don't we 'accidently-on-purpose' burn all these damn houses down?" Young men and women, Negro and white, who had recently seemed radical suddenly became the "moderates," arguing against the burning and the destruction of a white-owned grocery store and white-run Bible center in the area. They came away knowing that their victory was a new form of tokenism—violence grudgingly held in abeyance.

In abdicating responsibility for the lives of Negroes held in slums or in feudal conditions on the land, the white South may already have thrown away its chance to direct the new explosive energy that is feeding on Negro discontent. It has cut itself off from the slums. It has, through "welfare," paid poor Negroes (and, incidentally, whites) to stay off the middle class streets and out of sight. If there is any possibility for whites to regain any voice in the Negro community, they will have to forsake their solidarity, cease bloc voting, and above all work diligently to break the cycle of segregated housing, poor schools, and menial jobs. City governments would have no choice but to deal realistically with the causes of discontent rather than with hand-picked middle class Negro negotiators.

Until recently the great mass of Negroes living in poverty in city slums has been cut off from middle class Negroes, who emulated their white counterparts. The same thing was true politically—in rare instances when a Negro was elected to public office he usually joined the white power structure as soon as it made room for him. Now there is a new middle class mood of resentment, which matches in spirit if not in depth the folk consciousness of rural radicalism.

Reasons for this resentment are obvious. Middle class Negroes, virtually the only ones touched so far by federal legislation, have found progress toward tangible results of equal opportunity frustratingly slow. There is a new awareness that even the first "easy" gains—simply peeling off the old dead layers of institutionalized prejudice—took ten years. To struggle so long just to see two prominent civil rights leaders' children in one elementary school or seven middle class Negroes join the Georgia House while an outspoken representative of lower class Negro radicalism was denied his seat on grounds that he disqualified himself by rashly-worded opposition to the Vietnam war—to buy tokenism at too high a price—has at last worn patience thin. Finally, too, successful middle class Negro politicians are becoming aware of the wishes and race consciousness of their overwhelmingly poor constituency. Typical of this new voice in southern politics was the conservative, newly-elected Negro alderman of Atlanta who warned whites that Negroes in the heart of the city would no longer honor the traditional Negro-upper class white alliance which had agreed on an annexation balance and had at the same time assured control by paternalistic whites. Affirming that Negroes might soon control the city because of the white flight to the suburbs, the alderman speculated on Negroes' control of such vital services as electric power and water as an effective method of bargaining with white suburbia. He urged a fair housing law as a realistic remedy.

All levels of government must deal realistically with this new determination to negotiate from strength rather than rely on the old appeal to white conscience. Whites, too, must realize that in many ways the psychological condition of Negroes generally is similar to that of the middle class and peasantry in France prior to the revolution. The first feeble gains, opening the door just wide enough to let those outside look at life inside, have spurred a greater desire to participate in that life; at the same time frustration with lagging progress tempts the outsiders to destroy it . . . .

Federal Response

To many it has seemed that the nation's response to Negroes' needs has been unimaginative. And most efforts to implement existing laws have met with limited success. In the case of both the Civil Rights and Voting Acts, government action came as a response to protest by organized groups, and, though their effects were far from complete, they stilled the protest. There is every indication that the government will react in the same manner to continued violence against civil rights workers in the South. But this is merely a surface response—a sort of negation of negativism. Little actual headway can be made until Negroes in the South are less economically vulnerable and thus less subject to that method of intimidation. There is an incredibly tenacious determination on the part of poverty stricken people, particularly in rural areas, to give their children a chance for a better education. But loss of a job requires that people sustain themselves and their determination over what seems an endless time. Thus this form of reprisal is often more effective than a bombing or a beating. Violence often merely strengthens the will and in many cases unites a whole community where other attempts at unity have failed. And yet the violence persists, and does have its deadly effectiveness, if not directly any more, then in subconscious ways that limit Negro options and initiatives.

One of the strongest moves toward better enforcement of the civil rights law was the tightening of guidelines for school desegregation by the Office of Education for fall, 1966, school openings. But the test of this new strength was yet to come.

In a letter asking Negro parents voluntarily to send their children to segregated schools in spite of a Justice Department-initiated suit seeking desegregation of the system, Wilcox County, Alabama, school officials invoked the old reminder that one day the Yankee would tire of idealism, as he had in the past, abandoning the Negroes once again to the white South: "The people of this county will, in all probability, have to continue to live here in this county together after the influences from without have ceased. It is best for all if they can do so in a mutual spirit of good will."

One recalcitrant county in a state notorious for defiance should not be treated as a curiously rebellious mutant in an otherwise acquiescent region. At almost the same time that Wilcox County sounded its primitive warning, Deep South public officials were protesting the sudden, drastic nature of the Office of Education's new guidelines requiring pupil desegregation beyond tokenism and a start toward faculty integration. Twelve years after the Brown decision, feigned shock and overt defiance were not yet isolated phenomena and the violence hinted at in the Wilcox letter is still very much a factor to be reckoned with by people who defy custom in the "hard-core" South.

There have been ten killings, uncounted beatings, burnings, bombings, and shootings since that "peaceful" school desegregation began in September, 1965. Yet the result will never again be the old fearful withdrawal. And, though the violence is largely rural, it is felt in the city more keenly now than ever before. Though Negroes have for some time been moving into cities and all major civil rights organizations except the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee operate chiefly from city bases, the emotional center of the civil rights movement remains in places like Lowndes County, scene of two civil rights slayings, and a symbol of the Movement is unpunished brutalization of Negroes in such places. Now a "civil rights assassin" who gets off with a stern reprimand by the judge and a hearty handshake from his cohorts may trigger widespread violent reprisal by Negroes in city slums and on the land. A Negro "moderate's" outrage that his brother's killer escaped without even the reprimand prompted his rejection of any possibility of dealing peacefully with whites: "We'll have to lay and wait for them all night, and fight with them all day . . . . No Negroes are free until all Negroes are free. No one can free us but ourselves. . . . It's time to start killing."

Throughout accounts of the white South's violence there runs a new thread of Negroes' fearlessness and determination—and a warning: "I've been stomped down and stomped down all of my life. It's been long enough."

* * * * * * * *

Behind misleading headlines and misconceptions about orderly progress in the South were complexities long familiar.

In the first place, since 1954 and before, reaction to federal court decrees and law affecting segregation had been of three kinds—a grudging, but good faith acceptance, an effort to evade through administrative delay and cheating, and all-out resistance with violence and terroristic intimidation and reprisal. All three reactions could and did occur in all eleven states. Some states, like Tennessee, were characterized by a predominance of the first; some, like Virginia and South Carolina, by a predominance of the second; and some, like Alabama and Mississippi, by a predominance of the third. These were old familiar configurations in the South.

The pattern of reaction to the 1964 civil rights law was essentially this same three-way split. If there was any cause for rejoicing, it was in that at least in its official stance, the government of such a state as Mississippi was no longer encouraging all-out, violent resistance. But there was no overnight change in the South in attitude or patterns of compliance, with the overnight change of the law.

Nor was there any change in one of the oldest truths regarding these three southern reactions to the will of the nation. The resistance would be attempted, grow, and persist to the degree that the enforcement arms of the federal government allowed it. Full enforcement, as it has always been, was possible. It was not forthcoming.

Two other pieces of federal legislation promised a permanent solution to this old problem of enforcement. One was the pledge of the Johnson Administration in 1965 to enact new laws to strengthen southern institutions of justice, and to protect persons exercising constitutional rights from southern lawlessness. The other was the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which promised eventual development of Negro political power sufficient to demand compliance, and an end of lawless violence.

Out of these forces—poverty, continued white resistance, less than full federal enforcement, resultant disillusionment—and out of the new psychological state of Negro Americans (their unwillingness to settle for anything less than full citizenship) was coming something new in the South. It could destroy whatever hopefulness there was in the situation for the kind of transformation the nation seemed to think had already come. Or it could be another catalyst to force the nation and the white South yet another turn in the torturous facing about to full intellectual honesty in dealings with Negroes.

This most compelling factor has to do with the mood of answering anger, of retaliatory violence among Negroes of the South, and the threat in the cities, particularly, of rampage and riot, echoing the legacy of white lawlessness so long the South's greatest disgrace. The anger itself is not new, nor the fear among white Southerners that it will be unleashed. Only the signs that the anger is closer to the surface, nearer to exploding, are new. That it has not exploded in the past is but a dim hope that it will not explode in the future. Unless the realization of promises and potential can be speeded—this seems about the only hope.

But the worst excesses of the ugly side of the South have always had a counterpoint, however faint, of a relation between the races more truly representative of the American ideal than anywhere else. In the shifting patterns of public and private life in the South, forces are at work which encourage this better side of the South more than they have ever before been encouraged. The forebodings current in 1965-66 among those who know the region best in many ways suggest darkness before dawn. It is important to know, though, that the new day is not yet here.

The regional director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged that eleven Negro sharecroppers were being forced from their homes in Wilcox County for trying to register to vote.

The ACLU spokesman said some of the complaints seem "directly related to the intimidation section of the Voting Rights Act of 1965."

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS BASED ON A STUDY OF ECONOMIC INTIMIDATION AND DISCRIMINATION IN WILCOX, COUNTY, ALABAMA.

Submitted to the regional director of ACLU from a man living in Wilcox County.

A Negro couple registered to vote. The grocer demanded immediate payment of money owed for groceries: "You think you're smart. I'd like to take a damn two-by-four up side your head for registering. Get out of my store."

One of the families which was forced to move because of participation in demonstrations has no money, no food, and no credit. Their water was turned off by the city just after they took part in a protest march.

In many cases land was taken away and the rent raised from nothing to $25 per month. Most of the families involved make less than $1,000 a year.

A man whose mother was born in slavery on the land he was forced to leave is eighty-two years old. According to the study, "He did not want to move. No water or lights where he now lives. Will grow some corn."

One man and his wife, having no income other than $33 per month from Social Security, were told by their landlord that if they registered they would have to move. They registered and he carried out his threat.

A Negro woman voted in a state election. Her employer hit her with a broom and told her to "get out."

To younger people, with "lots of children, Freedom City can't be the last stop. They will have to find land of their own to build houses and to work."

Application has been made to the Office of Economic Opportunity for $1,500 for each farmer to start a house.

"Not only would this program provide houses for people living in Freedom City tents, but it would also provide them with the work of building them.

"So although Freedom City residents know they can't live in tents forever, they still feel they are a community with a future in Lowndes County . . . .

Greenville, MISSISSIPPI

Delta Ministry Reports, February, 1966.

Median income for plantation Negroes in the Delta is $456. Because of mechanization and a one-third crop allotment reduction, the state employment service estimates that 4,706 of the 18,124 seasonal workers living with their families on plantations in the Delta will not be needed to work next year.

Of those already off the land and out of work, living in tent cities and abandoned shacks along the Delta, about 50 entered the unoccupied Air Force base at Greenville January 31. Some thirty hours later they were forced to move out by air police.

Following what for many of them was just another eviction, three spokesmen of the group held a press conference in the Delta Ministry office in Greenville. Out of this conference came specific grievances, resentments, frustrations, and anger, and a real sense of alienation from American society:

"I feel that the federal government have proven that it don't care about poor people. Everything that we have asked for through these years has been handed down on paper. It's never been a reality.

"We the poor people of Mississippi is tired. We're tired of it so we're going to build for ourselves, because we don't have a government that represents us."

". . . See, you can only accept poor peoples by being poor and really know what being poor is like. And all this stuff about poverty programs and federal funds, that's out for poor peoples.

"We were looked upon as just a civil rights demonstration. But really we were there demanding and waiting and asking that these things be brought there to fill some desperate needs. And we was asking that the poor peoples be accepted as they stood. And instead of getting what we was asking we got the whole air force troopers in on us. To me, that's our government."

". . . The building was more respectable than poor hungry peoples with nothing and nowhere to go. If the peoples was satisfied and willing to sit there to find ways to do for themselves, the government should have let them stay there. The building was more important than poor folks . . . .

"The only reason . . . for eviction was that the building that we was in didn't have running water and didn't have any type of fire protection. And see I know that the federal government can't tell me that was the reason we was put out, because all over Mississippi houses don't have running water or fire protection."

A spokesman for the Delta Ministry recounted over a year's frustrating effort to get commodities distributed to poor people in the state. Each time a group within the county offered to distribute commodities the Department of Agriculture referred the plan to the Mississippi Welfare Department, which substituted an alternate program. In one instance immediately after the state department set up a commodity program the Department of Agriculture found it necessary to send an agent to investigate charges of discrimination. In another county the Food Stamp program was initiated. The Food Stamp program costs individuals money, so the very poor were not helped by it. Under a state-wide plan the welfare department is to get 24 million dollars worth of commodities from Agriculture and 1.6 million dollars from OEO to distribute food to 500,000 for six months. The food was due to be ready for distribution January 23. "When that day came we could not find (any) food being given out. And now it's February."

"I'd like to add to that to live, we got to go out and chop cotton for $3 a day, maybe two or three days a week. At the end of cotton picking, we gets the same for picking the scrap the machines leave. Then . . . when they start qualifying you for commodities, they say you got to find our how many people you worked for and get them to sign for you as being poor. If they don't feel like signing, like maybe they don't like you for civil rights activities, you don't get commodities. But you still poor, whether the white boss says so or not."

". . . See, if you belong to any civil rights group or participate, they tell you you can't get a job with the poverty program, because that's political and you know, you can't have that. And that's what's happening with the poverty program: It's political — that's the reason it's not doing anything for the poor."

". . . You know, we ain't dumb, even if we are poor. We need jobs. We need food. We need houses. But even with the poverty program we ain't got nothin but needs. That's why we was pulled off that building that wasn't being used for anything. We is ignored . . . The thing about property upset them, but the thing about poor people don't. So there's no way out but to begin your own beginning, whatever way you can. So far as I'm concerned, that's all I got to say about the past. We're beginning a new future:

". . . Because of the fact that we was refused by the government and evicted, it's important that we start planning our own government."

"The Washington County Board of Supervisors plans to meet at 10 a.m. Friday to reconsider its decision Monday to reject county participation in an expanded food program.

The president of the board confirmed that "the supervisors will meet in the courthouse Friday and give further consideration to participation in a $24 million program announced by the State Welfare Dept.

"The reason given Monday for the board's rejection was that county farmers and merchants don't want it.

"The program would probably benefit primarily Negroes and landowners are said to feel they would have more difficulty in getting spring labor if commodities were not cut off in March."

"Officers have been prone to assume the negativistic attitude that since the offense is a misdemeanor, why bother to conduct a full-fledged investigation? A conviction, they have reasoned, would hardly be worth the time, effort and expense consumed by a thorough probing.

TO: NSF/RAP Field Representatives

FROM: Jac Wasserman

I have sent you under seperate cover recent pamphlets issued by OEO; an excellent article reprinted from The NATION on "A Strategy to End Poverty" by two professors from the Columbia University School of Social Work; a list of organizations compiled by the South Carolina Council of sources for scholarships and financial aid for Negro students. This supplements the booklet, "Financial Aid for Southern Negro Students," which I sent you some time ago.

Also included in the packet is the most recent quarterly report prepared by Mr. Eugene Hagans, acting RAP field representative in South Carolina. As you may recall, it was suggested that I duplicate and circulate particularly interesting reports from each of the NSF/RAP representatives each month. The practice in South Carolina is for the RAP representative to prepare a quarterly report summarizing his activities, in addition to the daily log of where he went, whom he saw and what he did, which he submits each week. I believe that you will find Mr. Hagans' report both informative and instructive and we would welcome any questions you may have regarding any of the matters referred to in his report.

ASCS elections have been announced for the following states: Alabama, August 16; Florida and North Carolina, September 9; Arkansas and Louisiana, probably first or second week in November; Georgia, September 23; Mississippi, November 14th. I hope that you will familiarize yourself with the new regulations and procedures for the 1966 ASCS elections which are detailed in the ASCS Handbook on County and Community Elections(Short Reference 7-A). Among the important changes for the coming elections are:

1. The County Committees must give public notice of changes of Community boundries at least 35 days prior to the election which will include the designation and boundries of each community within the county. It is important that you secure the maps for all the communities in the counties where you will be working to assure that farmers who sign petitions to place candidates on the ballot are all eligible voters in the same community as their candidate. Many petitions were voided last year because the signers were not of the same community.

2. The county committee will give notice at least 35 days before the date set for the election that a slate of nominees will be selected for each community. The notice will be given along with the notice of community boundries. In addition to public notices in the newspapers and on radio, a special notice to each voter of record will:

(a) announce the forthcoming mail election;(b) state that petitions must be limited to one nominee each;(c) signed by at least 6 eligible voters (eligible voters may sign as many petitions as they desire): and most important, that(d) petitions must be received in the county office at least 25 days before the date set for the election.

Eligible farmers (including tenants and sharecroppers who do not receive a notice of the elections should go to the county office immediately to request a ballot and to have their names placed on the roll of eligible voters in their community.

The same regulation with regard to minority groups will be in force this year as last. The Community Committees must see that Negroes are placed in nomination in the same proportion as they are to the total farm population. This applies to community nominees only, without regard to nomination by petition. Community Committees are restricted to nominating between six and ten persons to be placed on the ballot, plus all those persons who have been nominated by petition.

Various types of educational leaflets will be developed for the Alabama ASCS elections and these will be made available to you for use in your state. In addition, the Washington office of ASCS will have leaflets available. They also now have a film strip (slides) which explains the election procedures. You can request the slides from your State ASCS office for showing at county and local meetings. County ASCS managers are also available (or should be) to meet with any group to explain the new election regulations. If he refuses to meet with you, please inform the State ASCS Director and also advise us so that we can inform the Washington office.

From: Jac Wasserman, Field Director

NSF/RAP Staff Meeting: Our next staff meeting is scheduled for October 5-7 in Atlanta. We will start our meeting at 7 P. M. on the 5th. Please reserve those dates. An agenda for this meeting will follow.

ASCS Elections: We have been unable to get ASCS to provide lists of eligible voters in each community without charge, although some county offices may be willing to let you photocopy their list. If local groups are unable to pay the county office for duplicating the list of eligible voters, they can arrange to have someone copy the lists which are required to be posted in the county offices. Please keep us informed of what you are doing to get maximum participation of Negro farmers in the 1966 ASCS elections. As soon as possible after the last date for submitting petitions in your state, let us know how many candidates have been placed on the ballot by petition in each county.

Consultant on Project Development: Walton H. Sharp who was formerly a field representative of our Southern Rural Training Project which wound up its operations as of July 30th will begin begin work with NSF on August 15th as a Consultant on Project Development. Walt's primary responsibility will include services to our Regional Office in Atlanta and to the NSF/RAP field staff in helping to plan and develop training, OEO, and other proposals for low-income groups with whom we work who have need for such expert service. If you are now working with some local groups who are considering specific projects which they hope to have funded by OEO or other government agencies, please write giving us full details and we will try to arrange to have Walt give them whatever assistance is needed. As we anticipate many requests for Walt's assistance, it is important to provide him with as much information as possible regarding the nature of the project, what preliminary work (if any) has already been done, whether you anticipate the cooperation of state and local officials in endorsing the project, etc. Priority will be given those projects which have the greatest liklihood of being approved and funded. All requests for Wal'ts services should be sent to my attention with a copy to Fay Bennett.

MEMORANDUM

TO: NSF staff
RAP field representatives
State Council on Human Relations directors

FROM: Fay Bennett

Re: NSF/RAP staff meeting, October 5 - 7, 1966.

Another item for your thinking in connection with our coming staff meeting is the enclosed Memorandum on Policy and Program to End Poverty in Rural America which came from our Board meeting earlier this year.

I am also enclosing another reprint from the Employment Service Revenue on the Tennessee Pilot Farm Management Projects by Dr. Sam Parigi. I know you have all seen this, but I would like to urge you to read it again so that we can discuss the feasibility of developing a number of these programs in selected areas where they can make the difference to the marginal farmer from being driven off the land to becoming a sussessful operator.

My final enclosure is a summary of the Southern Rural Training Project for the past year. I hope you will also read it.

I look forward to seeing you in Atlanta.

Dear Fay:

Thank you for your letter of September 21 and for putting me on your mailing list.

I may able to sit in on part of the meeting on part of the meeting on the 5th, but I plan to leave on the afternoon of the 6th to fill a long standing engagement in Huntsville, Alabama.

For whatever it is worth, I have a very favorable impression of both Mike Kenney and Walter Sharp. They seem to me to be very clear-headed, as well as hard and dedicated workers.

I look forward to seeing you.

Best wishes,

Dear Ed:

I am chagrined to discover that your name is not in our file to receive our reports and mailings. This has now been corrected. Meanwhile I am sending you separately a packet of materials sent out by this office.

Enclosed for your information are copies of letters sent to the state directors of the Human Relations Councils where we are now operating a joint program through the Rural Advancement Project.

Also enclosed for your information is a reprint from the Employment Service Review reporting on a Tennessee farm management training project which brought together the assistance of all of the relevant government agencies and improved the incomes of the participating farmers many times over.

Also enclosed is a summary of our final report on the Southern Rural Training Project. If you would like a copy of the complete 34-page report, I will be glad to send it to you.

If your schedule permits I hope you will sit in on as much of the Atlanta NSF/RAP staff meeting as possible.

Sincerely,

P.S. I have just heard from Mike Kenney that he has spent a day or two with LaVert Taylor. While Mike was only with LaVert a brief time, his report confirms my own feelings that LaVert can do a good job if he gets the help he needs to develop his self-confidence. I feel certain that Mike Kenney and Walt Sharp can be of great help to him.

I think Jac Wasserman may have already written to you about our coming meeting of NSF/RAP field staff in Atlanta beginning Wednesday evening October 5 and continuing through Friday afternoon October 7 at the Atlantan Hotel.

This meeting will concentrate on how to go about setting up specific and practical programs to help groups set up training and other programs to meet their needs and improve their incomes.

An example of what can be done to help marginal farmers improve their management skills and incomes so that they are no longer "marginal" is shown by the enclosed reprint on a Tennessee pilot project written by Dr. Sam Parigi, director of our Southern Rural Training Project.

Walt Sharp, who was one of the best field representatives of SRTP last year and who set up a number of the training programs in Louisiana and several other states, is continuing on the NSF's staff as Consultant on Project Development. He is working out of our regional office in Atlanta. He works extremely well with indigenous groups and also knows how to get the cooperation of local and state officials and community leaders. His services will be available to all of the field men. We hope at the Atlanta meeting that priorities can be established and that Walt can set up some dates to work with Mr. Lewis Black in developing more training projects in Alabama.

I hope that Mr. Black can attend the Atlanta meeting and of course we would very much welcome your being with us too. I look forward to meeting you.

Sincerely,

Your telephone call of last week gave me a big lift. It is most encouraging to know that the peopleof West Tennessee have pledged $3,000 toward the salary and expenses of a field representative who would work cooperatively with the Tennessee Council on Human Relations and the National Sharecroppers Fund for economic programs to improve their lot.

We look forward to seeing you and Rev. Isaac Richmond of Ripley, Tennessee, at our coming NSF/RAP workshop at the Atlantan Hotel in Atlanta beginning Wednesday evening, October 5, and continuing through Friday afternoon, October 7.

That will give Jac Wasserman and the rest of us a chance to meet Mr. Richmond, and it will give him and you an opportunity to meet our other NSF/RAP field staff and to participate in the two-day discussion.

Present at the NSF/RAP workshop will be two new men added to our NSF regional office. They are Mike Kenney, Field Coordinator, and Walt Sharp, Consultant on Project Development. Both of these men are extremely able, understand well the problems involved, work well with indigenous groups and know how to help them get programs developed and rolling.

This meeting will concentrate on how to go about setting up specific and practical programs to help groups set up training and other programs to meet their needs and improve their incomes.

An example of what can be done to help marginal farmers improve their management skills and incomes so that they are no longer "marginal" is shown by the enclosed reprint on a Tennessee pilot project written by Dr. Sam Parigi, director of our Southern Rural Training Project.

I do hope that it will be possible for us to raise the additional funds to add Mr. Richmond to our joint staff to work in West Tennessee where the need and promise are great.

P.S. I am most unhappy to learn that LaVert Taylor's performance has not been what you and we expected. I do believe he has suffered from lack of guidance in the field.

Now that Jac Wasserman has the added assistance ~~from~~ of Mike Kennay and Walt Sharp, I know that LaVert Taylor and the other RAP field men will get more help from Jac Wasserman and our regional office.

The Tennessee Pilot Farm Management Projects

SAM F. PARIGI

What appropriate skill training programs can be developed for unskilled, undereducated, low-income farmers living in economically declining rural areas? This problem for developers of manpower programs is compounded by the outmigration of younger, more skilled persons from such rural areas, and the difficulty of placing older, farm-oriented trainees in urban jobs. Tennessee's pilot farm management program is giving evidence of being a successful answer to this training challenge.

The MDTA farm management pilot program was developed through the cooperation of the Tennessee Vocational Education Division, the Tennessee Employment Service, and agencies of the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Although the program is still considered in the pilot stage, seven projects have been completed and four are in progress.

The Training Program

In conjunction with the county school boards which act as sponsors for these programs, the Tennessee Division of Vocational Education has developed a program designed to raise the income of trainees by 20 to 40 percent in the first year and 60 percent over a 3-year period. Prime attention is directed to four topics: Soils, crop production, livestock production, and farm plans. Other subjects receiving considerable attention are income taxes, electricity, farm organizations, and farm legislation. In each case, the trainee is shown how the topics in the training program apply to his own farming operations. This is the key to the high interest and success of trainees in the pilot projects.

A typical program would begin in July with the farm management instructor visiting the farm of each trainee to assess its potential and to discuss with the trainee what definite projects are to be undertaken on the farm as part of the training program. An overall farm plan is then developed for each trainee. The soil on each farm is "typed" early in the program by the Soil Conservation Service and the trainee is shown how to utilize the new information in his planting and fertilizing practices. Use is also made of "averaging" sheets, by which the farmer can compare his net income against what a similar farm would produce with fairly good management practices. Since trainees rarely net as much income as the farm sheets project, this income disparity provides incentive to learn and to exercise proper farm management practices.

Small farmers normally have inadequate records, so each trainee is taught to keep a record book of his farming operations. Bookkeeping is introduced early in the program, and the farm management instructor continues to check the farming records once a month.

Because most trainees know little of the range of agricultural services available to them from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, provision is made for representatives to explain their functions. In addition, the State Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) has made extra funds available to the trainees to carry out the soil conservation measures determined upon in their individual overall farm plans—

Dr. Sam F. Parigi is Director of the Southern Rural Training Project while on leave from Lamar State College.

For this farmer, the training resulted in better sanitation and good pastures for his livestock.

The trainees were shown how to reclaim their rain washed land so it could become productive.

liming, seeding, erosion control, and woodland improvement. Since funds from the ASCS must be matched by the farmer from his own resources, the trainee is urged to utilize at least part of his training allowances for this purpose. Field trips to experimental farms and plots of successful farmers are also taken to demonstrate proper farming techniques.

Vastly different educational levels are found among the trainees, although the program originally sought to require achievement equivalent to that of a high school sophomore for participation. In the first pilot program, provision was not made for specific classes in basic education, but 100 hours of communications instruction are now provided.

An interesting facet of the program is the integration of farm training and mathematical education. For example, the techniques of measuring land are first treated in the classroom, and instruction is given at that time on the multiplication and division needed to complete the task. Then the class goes into the field to apply the principles learned.

Throughout the program, classroom principles are directly applied to each farm. The instructor makes periodic visits to each trainee's farm and remains available to help the trainee if any difficult farming problems arise.

For trainees with marginal farms, the program may provide information on supplementary income opportunities. In one instance, the instructor suggested that the trainee might build a slaughterhouse to augment the farm income. The trainee bought a secondhand walk-in cooler and constructed the slaughterhouse with the aid of a $2,500 loan from the Farmers Home Administration. It is expected that the combined income from the farm and slaughterhouse operations will lift this trainee from the poverty classification.

Evaluation

The pilot farm management programs have shown outstanding success in raising the income of marginal farmers. A good example is the Yorkville Farm Management class, the first of the pilot programs, which began on July 15, 1963. Income tax returns indicated average net farm income of $343 for 1962, but $1,285 in 1964. Nineteen men completed the course. One man sold his farm but the other 18 increased their income—14 by over 100 percent! It is expected that the income of the trainees will continue to increase as they complete the various stages of their overall farm plans.

Good Attendance

Attendance averaged 97.4 percent and five men did not miss a class during the entire year. An esprit de corps developed among the trainees, and the community leaders voiced their approval of the program. The success of the program may also be judged by individual conferences held with trainees by representatives of the Employment Service. When asked if they would now take a job in town, each program graduate answered, "No."

Several conclusions may be drawn from the experience of this pilot program:

1. MDTA training can substantially increase the marginal farmer's income, which is especially meaningful when viewed in the context of the limited economic alternatives for unskilled older farmers. Furthermore, the rapid increase in income may also serve to revitalize the economic condition of destitute rural areas.

2. Marginal farmers seldom have utilized the vast range of governmental aids for agriculture. MDTA programs can help remedy this situation by assisting the small farmer to obtain the agricultural services to which he is entitled. Moreover, the concentration of trainees makes it easier for the agricultural agencies to provide services. Rather than duplicating farm agency services, the MDTA program supports them.

3. MDTA courses should also be promoted for marginal small business owners who lack managerial "know how." There is an extremely high rate of small retail business mortality which could be lessened through training related to finances, marketing, recordkeeping, and inventory.

Sponsored by the National Sharecroppers Fund and financed by a Department of Labor contract (as an Experimental and Demonstration Project under MDTA), the Southern Rural Training Project has stimulated the development of 28 training and basic education programs for more than six thousand unemployed and underemployed persons in seven Southern states. A number of these programs have already been funded and are in operation.

The purpose of the Southern Rural Training Project, directed by Dr. Sam F. Parigi, was to demonstrate that local leadership in poor rural areas, in cooperation with local institutions and organizations, could develop training programs to up-grade the skills and economic status of low-income, poorly educated rural persons.

Because of the expressed great need for such training programs and the relative unavailability of government services in rural communities, the Southern Rural Training Project has acted as a bridge between federal programs and the people who need them.

SUMMARY OF FINAL REPORT

The Southern Rural Training Project was an experimental manpower development project authorized under Section 201 of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962. The SRTP was originally created in January, 1964, by a contract between the U.S. Department of Labor and the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc., and was continued under a new one-year contract which terminated on July 31, 1966.

SRTP was to demonstrate that local leadership in poorer areas of the rural South, coupled with the resources of nearby colleges, employment and education agencies, and other organizations, could help develop training programs to assist unemployed and underemployed persons in improving their economic situation.

During the past year SRTP has helped local leadership in Southern communities to achieve the funding of twelve programs which will provide training for more than 2,100 low-income adults. Favorable consideration has been received for most of sixteen additional projects to serve 3,000 trainees. The cost of SRTP per trainee will average $30-$70, depending upon the number of projects, not yet approved, which become operative. Projects have been developed by SRTP under the Manpower Development and Training Act, Titles I and II; the Economic Opportunity Act, Titles II-A, II-B, III-B, and V; and the Vocational Education Act of 1963. The funds for two-thirds of the projects developed will come from federal agency sources other than the Department of Labor (OEO and HEW).

Title III-B of the Economic Opportunity Act was found to be the most suitable legislation under which projects in rural areas could receive funds. In developing these projects, SRTP field staff encouraged indigenous people to take an active part in the planning and processing. Bi-racial advisory committees were organized, allowing seasonal farm workers to meet on an equal basis with their employers and with government agency personnel. These committees, it is hoped, will become permanent organizations to apply for other programs to meet their community needs.

In Louisiana, Georgia, and Tennessee, the first funded Title III-B programs were developed with the assistance of SRTP. From these programs, a model was developed upon which the design of other III-B projects was based, with variations to fit specific local needs.

With MDTA programs, SRTP found that the greatest problem rested in the long delays between initial application and final approval of projects. During these delays, which often extended to a year or more, local people remained ignorant of what was happening to their project; local enthusiasm consequently lessened; potential trainees were forced to accept alternatives; and replacements had to be found for originally chosen staff.

The greatest contribution of SRTP lay in providing the technical assistance necessary for local groups to learn to develop and process projects. If rural areas, small towns and colleges, and groups without financial resources are not to be excluded from manpower development efforts, similar technical assistance must be provided to potential project sponsors throughout the rural South

The National Sharecroppers Fund is glad to have had this opportunity to use its resources in cooperation with government and local groups to meet urgent training needs. NSF expects to continue its role in bridging the gap between these local rural groups and government resources.

MEMO

From: Jac Wasserman

To: NSF/RAP Field Staff

I. Subject: October Staff Meeting: October 5-7, 1966.

In order to use our time most efficiently at the coming staff meeting, and to get into the habit of seeing our daily work and operations as part of a group effort across the states in which we work, we would like to request that each field man come to the staff meeting prepared to give a Summary Report of his activity for the current year(1966).

II. Summary Report:

A. Please be prepared to present a report of between 20-30 minutes of your work in 1966 in the following areas:

(1) community organization
(2) co-ops
(3) credit unions
(4) OEO programs
(5) relations with state and local USDA agencies and officials
(6) ASCS elections
(7) other Federal programs

B. What do you expect to do as a follow-up for the rest of this year, and for the first six months of 1967? What new programs are you planning to work on, and where?

C. How do you evaluate what you have been doing?

(1) Do we have any real influence in helping solve the problems of the very poor?
(2) How do you view your relations with the Regional office? What are your suggestions for improving relations?

D. Where should we put our time and energy in the field as a whole field staff?

(1) Job development?
(2) Federal programs?
(3) Co-ops and credit unions?
(4) Other?

III. One of the kinds of discussions we would like to come out of the staff meeting would be a discussion as to whether or not the whole field staff should begin working on one project area -- e.g. credit unions, co-ops, job development, etc. -- in order that we might develop a sense of capability and expertise and group movement that can be shared among us, and so that people would not feel that they were working alone and without connection to the rest of the field operation.

Another type of question which might be raised at this staff meeting is: Should our field operations now begin to distinguish between rural-farm and rural non-farm programs, particularly in the light of the fact that there are more people living in rural areas in the South who do not live on farms, than those who live on farms?

IV. We would like to have these 1966 summary reports given orally, and be accompanied by a written outline or a summary which will be available for distribution to all participants.

The only representative who came to our last Atlanta staff meeting with duplicate copies of his past year's report was LaVert Taylor. Hubert Thomas read his report to us, and copies are now being duplicated for distribution. These will be sent to you in a few days.

We would like to have your report for our files and for distribution to the other men. Could you arrange to send to me ten copies as soon as possible? We can all learn from each other and such exchanges of our experiences, problems, and successes can help us to help each other and to do a better job.

We would be most grateful to also receive your evaluation and criticism of the staff meeting, and your recommendations for improving the next one.

1. Enclosed are copies of organizing manuals: "Leadership Manual," "County Government in Mississippi," "The Time Has Come to Get That Power! A political handbook for the black people of Hinds County," and "What is a Co-op?". These were prepared by Ted Seaver or by the Freedom Information Service in Mississippi.

2. They appear to be excellent jobs and might serve as models for your work or for groups in your areas.

3. Please show them to your State Directors also.

4. If you would like more copies, please order them direct from Freedom Information Service, or from Ted Seaver -- whose address you can obtain from James Mays. (The address for Freedom Information Service is: P. O. Box 120, Tougaloo, Mississippi 39174.)

1) Enclosed please find a list of cooperative associations in your state that have received loans from the Farmers Home Administration.

2) I would recommend that you visit as many of these associations as possible to find out as much as you can about how they were formed, their activities, and whether Negro farmers in the area are participating in these associations. This information may be helpful to you when assisting other groups in the state who may want to form their own cooperatives with assistance from FHA.

3) The FHA county supervisor or the FHA State office can give you the names of the officers of these associations and their addresses, as well as any other pertinent information about their operation.

4) We would appreciate receiving a report from you after you have had the opportunity to visit some of these cooperatives.

From: Jac Wasserman

Subject: FHA funded co-ops in the South

1. On 11 November I wrote you a memo which recommended that you visit as many of the co-ops as possible in your state, and requesting a report of your visits to these co-ops.

2. We have not received a reply from you on this subject.

3. The reason we are interested in these co-ops is that Mike Kenney and Al Ulmer, et al, are working on calling a South-wide conference of low-income co-ops early next year. From this conference we hope to get a Federation of co-ops which can become a powerful force in changing the social and economic conditions in the rural South.

4. But, since we do not have any information about these co-ops funded by FHA we do not want to send out invitations until we find out more about what kind of people are involved. We know that more than half are Negro co-ops, or associations without charters. We would like to know which co-ops are white and which are Negro; which integrated, and which are relatively independent of the power structure, which have charters, etc.

5. Much of the information about the cooperatives in particular counties can be obtained by visiting the FHA County Supervisors. If these are small associations of a few farmers formed solely to purchase equipment, they can be eliminated from the list we sent you. We are particularly interested in cooperatives open to all eligible farmers.

6. Mike and Al are going to be spending most of their time between now and February working on this conference. They need the information you can furnish them. Would you please make it a point to visit the FHA county offices and the co-ops in your immediate area, and get a report to our office by the end of the first week in January. Thank You.

Dear Don:

We reported on the suit you filed on behalf of several farmers against J.A. Minter et al at our Board meeting recently. The Board was pleased to know that this suit has been filed and that Jac Wasserman and other members of our staff have been helpful in obtaining pertinent information needed in preparing the brief.

However, our Board sees no action that it can take at the present time in support of the brief in addition to what we have already done. They would like to continue to be kept informed and to receive copies of legal documents in regard to the suit. The lawyers on our Board will then discuss the possibility of appearing amicus at the appelate level.

Dear Miss Bennett:

We have received a report from our Georgia State Office concerning the letter you received from Mr. Hubert D. Thomas of the Georgia Council on Human Relations.

Our State staff has discussed the observations made by Mr. Thomas regarding the inadequacy of rural housing funds with our staff members who attended the meeting at Quitman, Georgia. Apparently Mr. Thomas' observation was based on a misunderstanding because our staff did not mention a shortage of funds for self-help housing loans. They did, however, mention that the Farmers Home Administration was trying to obtain local lenders for insured loans.

If additional information is needed, please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

REPORT ON THE RURAL ADVANCEMENT PROJECTS

GENERAL

The programs of the Rural Advancement Projects are as varied as the needs of rural people in the four states now participating and the personalities and talents of the four directors. Some programs are common to all, such as the emphasis in late summer and early fall on ASCS elections and efforts to educatedrural folk about avialable government assistance. This is due in no small measure to the good technical assistance provided by the National Sharecroppers' Fund, which has convened the four directors along with NSF field men for three meetings in Atlanta, But the adaptability of the rpogram can be seen in the emphasis on credit unions in Alabama while community organizations was pushed in Georgia.

Each of the RAP Directors, simply by his presence and knowledgeability, has become the focus of considerable help to the areas served. They found themselves drawing on the resources of SRC's Voter Education and Community Organization Projects, as well as those of the Southern Rural Training Project and many agencies of the federal government. Their being on the staffs of the state councils on human relations focused the attention of the other staff members as well as laymen on rural needs.

We think that the following reports will indicate a usefulness far beyond the specific instances cited.

SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. L. S. James has been Director of the South Carolina Rural Advancement Project, the pilot project, from its beginning. He took a six-months leave of absence this year, in order to work with the Southern Rural Training Project. During this time the Rural Advancement Project had Mr. Eugene Hagans as Acting Director.

As with all of the R.A.P. men, much of Mr. James' time, especially during the summer, was devoted to Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service elections. According to the 1960 census there were thirty counties in South Carolina which had between 30% and 75% of the total number of farm operators who were non-white. Yet in 1965 there were no Negroes on any county committee and only fourteen on community committees. And those fourteen were in only six counties. Since the ASCS committee aparatus determines crop allotments for all farmers this matter is of great importance. The effort in South Carolina included a statewide meeting in Columbia on August 6 which was attended by representatives of 20 counties, numerous local and county meetings, and constant education through conversation on all field trips.

Mr. James' other activities included the following, which are typical:

A Negro woman, a Home Demonstration Agent, was being assigned to work with Negroes only and knew of many cases of discrimination against Negroes in her county. She was helped to direct a formal complaint to appropriate authorities and to secure investigation. She reports much better treatment as a result.

A modern cooperative supermarket has opened in Denmark, South Carolina. It is operated by the Bamberg County Economic Development Corporation, which Mr. James helped organize two years ago.

Mr. James is a member of the Board and Executive Committee and Chairman of the Personnel Committee for "Project T-Square" (Training for Tomorrow), an O.E.O. program which will set up 12 major centers for training unemployed people and providing basic education for persons who completed less than five school grades.

Realizing that farm operations cannot provide the total answer for rural workers, Mr. James seeks other avenues, After patient negotiation over a period of two years he has succeeded in getting two Negroes employed as bus drivers by the Columbia City Bus Transportation Company. These pioneers are doing well.

FLORIDA

Staffing of the four RAP projects was completed with the employment of The Reverend LaVert Taylor in Florida, starting March 1.

Mr. Taylor works out of Tallahassee. He has been concentrating on community organization, educational groundwork for coops and credit unions, familiarizing himself and area Negro farmers with USDA officials and programs, and the ASCS elections. He has deliberately confined his efforts mostly to three north Florida counties: Leon, Jefferson, and Jackson.

In the matter of community organization, Mr. Taylor has avoided formation of new organizations. He found that the people felt "exploited" by national agencies--including civil rights groups--which seemed primarily concerned with establishing local affiliates of their particular institutions. Instead he has sought to make existing groups more effective. In Jackson County he was instrumental in reorganizing the Farmers Home Organization, reactivating six community development groups, organizing a voter registration program through the local NAACP, and working through a strong Voters League on ASCS elections. He also helped to secure acquisition of land--at fair compensation--for an International Paper Company plant at Sneads which will mean 500 jobs for the area. In Leon County he secured cooperation of three community groups to sponsor a Conference on School Desegregation.

ds

A conference on co-ops and credit unions was held in Jackson County with the aid of Mr. Al Ulmer of SRC's Community Organization Project, Mr. Lewis Black of the Alabama RAP Project, and the regional office of the National Sharecroppers' Fund.

Mr. Taylor has found the County Agents in both Jackson and Jefferson to be altogether uncooperative. There is no Negro agent in either county and no 4-H Club program available to Negro youngsters. The situation has been reported to the Department of Agriculture with no results to date. On the other hand, the local offices of the Farmers Home Administration have been very helpful.

Efforts on the ASCS elections resulted in election of a Negro as Vice Chairman of one community committee and two others as members of the same committee in Jackson County. No Negroes were elected this year in Jefferson County.

GEORGIA

Mr. Hubert D. Thomas, RAP Director in Georgia, has concentrated on the counties of southwest Georgia.

He began with three area workshops on rural problems. They were held in Albany, Bainbridge and Thomasville and were attended by people from twelve counties. Mr. Wasserman of the NSF regional office and the late Oliver Holmes of the Georgia Council on Human Relations assisted with these workshops.

Thomas' next major effort had to do with the Quitman office of the FHA. Not a single loan had been made to a Negro farmer in that area. Mr. Thomas' efforts, in cooperation with the NAACP, resulted in an investigation and to date three Negro farmers have secured housing and operational loans. Also, the FHA Supervisor was transferred and replaced with a man with a different attitude.

A major project has been the formation of a multi-county council on human relations in southwest Georgia. The council has had well-attended meetings in the seats of the various counties. The human relations coucil has been instrumental in forming Community Action Programs in Worth, Colquitt, Thomas, Grady, Miller, and Mitchell counties.

With the assistance of Al Ulmer of SRC Mr. Thomas helped eighteen heads-of-households from southwest Georgia to apply for self-help housing loans. They have entered into an agreement to pool their labor to build a house for each family, using financial and technical assistance provided through the OEO. Others in the area are interested in this program.

The Georgia RAP Director assisted the Civil Rights Commission to set up an open meeting on discrimination in the Extension Service, Farmers Home Administration, and Agricultural Stabilization Service. This meeting, at which complaints and the testimony of officials were heard, was held in Macon in May.

ALABAMA

Mr. Lewis Black is the RAP Director in Alabama. He was employed beginning February 1. A school teacher in Greensboro he had been for many years a successful leader of Negroes in that area. He retains his home in Greensboro and works from there.

He has given considerable attention to establishing and improving credit unions. Applications for credit union charters have been made in Wilcox and Sumter Counties. A charter has been approved for one in Marengo County, Mr. Black is working with groups in Greene, Monroe, Clarke, Tuscaloosa, and Lee Counties toward establishment of credit unions.

A cooperative supermarket has been established in Hale County and a promising marketing co-op has been started in Perry.

Both the RAP Director and the Executive Director of the Alabama Council on Human Relations have worked for months to secure a surplus food distribution program in Hale and Perry Counties. The county officials refuse to pay the cost of storing and distributing the badlyneeded commodities from county funds and thus far have blocked efforts to organize a Community Action Agency, so that funds could be secured from the Office of Economic Opportunity. Mr. Black has had word that the Agriculture Department will send the commodities to a private organization for distribution--provided they have $12,000 in the bank to pay the distribution and storage costs!

Mr. Black helped to prepare a proposal to the Office of Economic Opportunity for a leadership training program which was operated through Miles College this summer.

He assisted organizations in five counties to prepare proposals to SRC's Voter Education Project. Two of them were funded.

Like the other RAP Directors, Mr. Black's efforts in July, August, and September were concentrated on the ASCS elections.

RAP

a credit union is a group of people who combine their funds, and who make those funds work for their own benefit.

THIS BOOKLET TELLS WHAT YOUR CREDIT UNION CAN DO FOR YOU

The object of a credit union is a unique financial service for its members—credit, savings, dividends. Only the members can use and profit from the credit union's services.

Your credit union is NOT a bank. It is not a labor union—it is not a loan company—it is not a credit bureau. It is not even a business in the usual sense. It is different from all other financial institutions.

But everybody can use the help of a credit union in most transactions that involve money. This includes well-off people with plenty of cash, as well as people who desperately need financial aid. It includes all the 13 million average people who are now credit union members, most of them with tomorrow's pay check already spent for the good things of life.

The credit union can help you, too, in more ways than you think.

YOUR CREDIT UNION IS LEGALLY CHARTERED FOR FINANCIAL SELF-SERVICE

Credit unions are chartered by the state, provincial, or federal government, and are incorporated under credit union law. The charters differ in some details, but they all provide for the same basic services.

The government that issues the charter supervises the credit union.

The first credit union in North America was founded in Canada in 1900. In 1909, the first credit union in the United States was founded in New Hampshire, and the first state credit union law was passed in Massachusetts. A Federal law permitting organization of credit unions anywhere in the United States was passed in 1934.

Under most laws, a credit union charter is granted to seven or more persons, and to a field of membership of 50 or more. Members must have a "common bond" of association—be employees of the same employer, or belong to the same church, fraternal group, labor union, co-op, or closely knit community.

it pays to save in the credit union

MORE THAN 13 MILLION MEMBERS HAVE PUT ABOUT 5.5 BILLION DOLLARS OF THEIR SAVINGS MONEY IN THEIR CREDIT UNIONS

The credit union gives you convenient, profitable savings service. "Savings" actually take the form of purchasing credit union shares, usually in units of $5 each. The only actual cost to members is the small membership fee.

The credit union is always handy, making saving as easy as possible. Usually it is located on the premises where members work, or conveniently nearby. Credit unions with scattered membership encourage regular saving by mail. Only $3.57 saved each week (with a 3% dividend) will total $1,000 in 5 years.

Your investment in credit union shares is withdrawable and is safe. This was dramatically proved during the depression years, when credit unions grew stronger than ever.

Dividends (paid on shares) in well-operated credit unions are extremely good. The average is well over 3%.

As a matter of fact, well-established and well-managed credit unions by the thousands are completely self-supporting, pay adequately the people they hire to do the work, maintain convenient and attractive offices, and still pay the highest return on investment of any savings institution in their communities.

Some not only do this; they also refund interest to the borrowing members.

it costs less to borrow at the credit union

ANOTHER BENEFIT OF THE CREDIT UNION IS CONVENIENT, LOW-COST LOAN SERVICE

Credit unions never charge more than 1% per month on the unpaid balance of a loan. This is a $6.50 charge on a $100 loan repaid in 12 monthly payments. The cost is reduced if a loan is paid in advance of schedule. The credit union invites you to advance-pay as much as possible to benefit from lowered cost. There are no penalties, no refinance charges.

When you borrow from your credit union, you deal as a member-owner, not as a customer. The difference is vast.

The loan terms are straightforward. You know exactly what your credit is going to cost—there can be no "pack," no extra fees, no hidden charges, no shift in the rate of interest charged.

why borrowing is different at the credit union

THE GREATEST DIFFERENCE IS THIS: THE CREDIT UNION EXISTS TO MEET NEEDS AND REQUIREMENTS OF MEMBERS, NOT TO MAKE MONEY ON THEM

You can borrow for virtually any worthwhile purpose—emergencies that demand cash, consolidation of pressing debts, installment purchases of every description. You can borrow when it's necessary, or when it's merely convenient. No good purpose is overlooked. Many members have learned the wisdom of borrowing to avoid withdrawal of hard-to-replace share savings.

The credit union expects to get its money back from borrowing members, and it does. But few loan requests are refused, and the member who meets unexpected difficulties can always expect friendly and understanding cooperation from his credit union.

credit unions have many safeguards

Credit union law requires the credit union to maintain ample reserve funds for possible bad loans. These funds have proved to be more than adequate. Based on available data, credit unions have had losses of approximately ⅕ of 1%.

A credit union auditing committee (supervisory or examining committee), elected by the members, examines the books periodically. The government also sends its examiners to the credit union once a year or more.

All persons who handle credit union funds or records are bonded.

Most credit unions provide Loan Protection insurance, insuring borrowers in the amount of their loan balances without extra cost. This protection (subject only to liberal age and health restrictions) cancels the loan if the borrower dies or is permanently disabled. The debt dies with the debtor, releasing co-signers and any property pledged as security.

But the best guarantee of the security of funds in the credit union is the character of the members who belong to it. The many thousands of credit unions operating today demonstrate how solid that security is.

of credit union success

Credit unions seem to violate all laws of economics. Why can credit unions pay good dividends, and at the same time extend credit far more freely and at lower true cost in the long run than any other source of consumer financing?

The explanation is easy: credit unions require no heavy capital, no elaborate space, no competitive location. Most officers serve without pay. The borrowers are dependable, and losses are few.

But more important than low operating cost and negligible losses is the motivating power of the credit union. It comes from people like you who belong and use the services offered. Members make the credit union succeed.

credit unions are easy to understand

Credit union operation is not only safe, but simple as well. When a group of people obtain a charter, this is what they do:

1) put their money (shares) into a common fund—
2) elect some of their members (as directors) to manage the fund—
3) lend money to each other from the fund—
4) charge interest for the use of that money—
5) and with the interest (credit union income),
6) pay the cost of running the credit union, and then
7) distribute the rest of the earnings to shareholders (as dividends)

Management of the credit union is delegated to the board of directors. Directors are elected at organization meetings and thereafter at annual membership meetings. A Credit Committee is also elected to pass on all loan applications—and a Supervisory Committee is elected to check the books and guard the interests of the members.

Officers are president, vice-president, treasurer, and secretary-clerk. They are elected by and from the board. Chairmen and secretaries of standing committees are named in some credit unions by the board, in some by the committees themselves.

The treasurer is the manager of the credit union, unless a manager is hired. The treasurer is the only elected officer who may be paid.

questions and answers

Q. How much money may I put in the credit union?

A. In only a few areas are there legal limits. Most credit unions encourage you to save as much as you can.

Q. How much can I borrow from the credit union?

A. Here the law does set limits, which vary with individual laws. The board is empowered to make further rules, but the most successful credit unions are generally the ones with the fewest loan restrictions.

Q. Who gets the profits in the credit union?

A. There is no profit. The credit union has no capital stock, no absentee owners. The members have the only claim on the assets. What money is left over after expenses can only be used for the good of the members.

Q. Where does the credit union keep its money?

A. Most of it is out in loans to members. A working balance is kept in a local bank. When shares greatly exceed loan needs, the excess can be loaned to other credit unions, or invested in government bonds and other approved outlets.

Q. Who may join the credit union?

A. Only the persons named in the charter as the field of membership may join the credit union or use its services. In most credit unions the field includes the member's immediate family.

Q. How do members exercise their ownership?

A. All members can vote at the annual meeting, when officers are elected and policies are decided. Nobody outside the credit union has any part in its management, policies, or operation.

Q. What is an interest refund?

A. An interest refund is a return of a portion of the interest paid on loans to the borrower. It is an increasingly popular way of reducing the already low cost of credit union loans.

how can you use your credit union

Start a savings program. Make regular purchases of shares, and keep your money growing.

Borrow when it helps you. For example, before you make your next major purchase "on time," check with your credit union on the true cost of the proposed transaction. Financing at the credit union will probably save you money.

Be an active member—get interested! Hundreds of thousands of people in the United States and Canada have found credit unions and the way they help people an absorbing personal interest. As an owner of the credit union, it's your chance to accomplish solid and significant results—results that can affect the lives of every member of your group.

If you are not a member, remedy that right now. Go to your credit union office, or the nearest credit union officer or authorized representative, and sign up!

Take along your money problems, and begin working them out today.

Sign the card! Become a member-owner of your credit union.*

IDENTIFICATION

The Southern Rural Training Project is a manpower development project authorized by Section 201 of the Manpower Development and Training Act. It was created by a contract between the United States Department of Labor (Office of Manpower, Automation and Training) and the National Sharecroppers Fund in order to help carry out the fundamental goal of Section 201 of the Act:

> ". . . promote and encourage the development of broad and diversified training programs, including on-the-job training, designed to qualify for employment the many persons who cannot reasonably be expected to secure full-time employment without such training. . . ."

OBJECTIVES

The project is designed to demonstrate that local leadership in poorer areas of the rural South, in cooperation with local institutions and organizations, can assist in developing effective training programs that will help rural unemployed and underemployed to better their economic status. In its first year of operation the project has stimulated programs in Georgia, Louisiana, and Tennessee. Now in its second year, the Southern Rural Training Project will assist in developing programs in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. Other Southern states may be added.

PROCEDURE

President Lyndon B. Johnson in his Manpower Report of March, 1964, said, "We must have new willingness to experiment with fresh approaches and put resulting knowledge to practical use."

In keeping with this approach, the Southern Rural Training Project staff, through local contacts with leadership of rural groups, helps to develop experimental and demonstration programs as well as other needed training programs. This work is done in cooperation with various interested groups, such as the State Employment Service, agricultural agencies, educational institutions, and other state and federal agencies concerned with training. At times these groups, despite their real interest in and desire for such government projects in their area, are understaffed and, consequently, cannot devote the time necessary to initiate these projects to reach the rural, hard-core unemployed and underemployed. Moreover, occasionally some agencies are geared more for the urban rather than rural disadvantaged persons. Thus our procedure, in working closely with the local sponsors of proposed projects, is to help develop effective working relationships with the various agencies and groups in the area in an attempt to bring desirable manpower development projects into existence.

THE FIRST YEAR

Several training projects of diverse patterns have been developed with the assistance of the Southern Rural Training Project staff during the first year of its operations. One, sponsored by Austin Peay State College, Tennessee, is a cooperative plan involving three TVA watershed community groups. It will train farm people, unemployed miners, and mountain people, and will test different selection procedures. A second, sponsored by the Chattanooga Public School system, will train a group of rural migrants in the city, together with a group from the rural supply areas; it will emphasize literacy and test various teaching methods. A third, sponsored by Fort Valley State College in Georgia, will train small farmers in farm management. A project sponsored by the Loyola Institute of Human Relations in New Orleans will train sugar-cane workers in the use of farm machinery. Another, also in Louisiana, is sponsored by St. Mary's Dominican College and will train rural young women as secretaries. Other projects are in the planning or idea stages.

In addition, the Southern Rural Training Project, under the provisions of a special amendment to its governing contract, has participated in a special program, in cooperation with the State Employment Service, designed to test and demonstrate suitable methods of bringing unemployed farm workers together with those who have need of their services.

NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND

The National Sharecroppers Fund is a nonprofit, voluntary agency with more than twenty-five years' experience in working with Southern sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and other low-income farm and rural families. Through this work NSF has gained contacts throughout the South and has developed programs for rural people who are hard to reach through normal governmental channels. In these programs NSF has worked cooperatively with many church leaders, educators, and community relations leaders, as well as with government officials.

OVER-ALL PURPOSE OF THE SRTP

The SRTP's activities will be geared to assist in achieving the fundamental goals of President Johnson's Active Manpower Policy:

- to ascertain job needs
- to develop the abilities of our people
- to link the first two—to match people and jobs

How the Credit Union Operates

Regular Saving

Members are encouraged to save regularly. (Savings are called "shares" in the credit union.) From this accumulated capital, loans are made to members for practically any good purpose at low interest. After expenses are paid and legal reserves set aside, the credit union's income is returned to the members in the form of dividends on their savings. Dividends are paid to encourage further thrift, and as a reasonable rental for the use of the members' money.

With the credit union's help, thousands of people have learned the habits of thrift and regular saving. People who had never saved before now began to put aside a little each payday. Today, credit union members have accumulated nearly $7 billion of savings in the United States alone. Much of this money would never have been saved, except for the credit union.

Life Savings Insurance

Many credit unions provide Life Savings insurance as an added inducement for thrift. This insurance is supplied to savers without extra charge. Under the plan, each eligible dollar a member saves (up to the agreed limit) before age 55 is matched with a dollar of life insurance. A decreasing scale applies to money saved after age 55.

Funds Are Protected

The funds in the credit union are protected in many ways. (1) the credit union operates under law and is supervised by the government. Government examiners inspect it regularly. (2) The supervisory (auditing) committee of members makes a constant check on the credit union's operation. (3) the law requires surety bonding and substantial reserves to protect the money against operational hazards. Throughout their history, credit unions have had an outstanding safety record.

Low Cost Borrowing

Credit union loans are personal loans, made for provident or productive purposes. Common reasons for borrowing include old bills, taxes, medical expenses, autos, vacations, home equipment, funerals, education, weddings, and family emergencies.

In some places, credit unions are permitted to make mortgage loans when surplus funds are available. But the main function of credit unions is to meet their members' needs for consumer credit.

The interest on credit union loans is never more than 1% per month on the unpaid balance. There are no extra charges. Credit unions' lower interest rates save money for members, and make more money available for other uses. Each year, many credit unions are able to refund to borrowers a portion of the interest they paid on loans.

Character Is Security

The character of the borrower is always the basic security for a credit union loan. Laws vary as to how much a credit union may lend to any one member, but it is common for a credit union to lend as much as $500 on the borrower's signature — and much more with additional security, such as a co-signer or chattel mortgage.

Loan Protection Insurance

Most credit unions provide Loan Protection insurance without extra charge for eligible borrowers. Under this plan, the borrower's loan balance is life-insured. The loan is automatically paid up in case the member dies or is disabled, so that his heirs do not inherit his debt to the credit union.

Credit Unions Around The World

The credit union idea is spreading rapidly throughout the free world. Credit unions now operate in more than 70 countries, and more are added each year. Through CUNA International, Inc., your credit union assists in the development of new credit unions in other parts of the world.

In many places, credit unions have dramatically improved living conditions. Until the credit union showed the way, it was seldom realized that people of extremely limited means could save, and by lending to each other at low interest, could provide their own capital for small-scale enterprise. Where there was only poverty and discouragement, the credit union has brought hope and success. People have been given their first incentive to save money, and the first opportunity in their lives to borrow money at a reasonable rate.

Just as important, they have received experience in practical democracy, which results when people own and operate their own credit unions.

What a Credit Union Is

A credit union is a group of people who agree to save their money together and to make loans to each other at low interest.

A credit union is organized by members of a particular group — for instance, people working for the same employer; people who belong to the same fraternal order, church, or labor union; or people who live in the same closely knit community. Membership is open to all in the group, regardless of race, color, or creed.

Credit unions are democratic. The members elect their own officers and committeemen and set policies for the credit union at the annual meeting.

The History of Credit Unions beginnings in Europe

The credit union idea began over 100 years ago. Friedrich Raiffeisen, mayor of a small German community, devised a credit society in 1849 to help his townspeople combat poverty and usury. He reasoned that the members could save money together and make loans to each other at a low interest rate. The borrower's character would be the primary security for the loan.

Raiffeisen's idea was a success. Before he died in 1888 he had started more than 425 credit unions. His idea spread to other countries and remains the basic idea of credit unions today. He is considered the father of the credit union movement.

developments in North America

The credit union idea was brought to North America by Alphonse Desjardins (1854-1920), a legislative reporter in Quebec. Deciding that credit unions would be the answer to the usury that plagued his people, he founded his first credit union at Levis, Quebec, in 1900. Six years later, Quebec passed the first credit union law in North America. In 1909, Desjardins started the first U.S. credit union (in New Hampshire), and assisted with passage of the first U.S. credit union law (in Massachusetts).

Edward A. Filene, a famous Boston storekeeper, was responsible for the rapid spread of credit unions in the United States. Filene saw the credit union as a way to put buying power through low-cost credit into the hands of working people. He spent over a million dollars of his personal fortune to support the development of credit unions in America.

◀ Read how credit unions are serving today

Credit Union Organizations

Credit unions have been working hand in hand effectively since 1921, when Edward Filene set up the Credit Union National Extension Bureau. This organization began immediately to win public support, to get laws passed, to establish new credit unions, and to enlist volunteers. Today there are credit unions in every state and province of the United States and Canada, and in many other parts of the world, served by their own credit union leagues.

Leagues

A league of credit unions is a voluntary association supported by the credit unions within a given state, province, or other geographical area. The league is governed by its member credit unions and is supported by their dues.

In addition to founding new credit unions, the league offers its credit unions management advice and bookkeeping assistance; legal counsel; representation before legislative bodies and supervisory agencies; training programs for credit union officers; public relations assistance; insurance counseling; and other essential services. In addition, the league acts as chief liaison with the other service organizations credit unions have established.

Chapters

Credit unions of a community or specific geographical area may join to form a chapter. Chapters sponsor educational programs, and may undertake joint promotion and public relations projects.

CUNA International, Inc.

(formerly Credit Union National Association)

CUNA is the international association which serves all credit union leagues. Through their leagues, credit unions receive from CUNA the services and materials best supplied by a central international source to supplement the league program. Even more important, CUNA is the unifying force in the progress of the credit union movement.

Like the leagues, CUNA is a non-profit, dues-supported membership organization. Membership in CUNA is automatic for the members of the affiliated leagues. A portion of each dues dollar paid to the league is forwarded to CUNA to support its part in the service program provided for credit unions. In areas where there is no league, credit unions may affiliate directly with CUNA. CUNA headquarters are located in Filene House, Madison, Wisconsin, with a Canadian office at Toronto, Ontario.

Cuna Supply Cooperative

CUNA Supply Cooperative is the central production unit and "mail order house" of the credit union movement. It is a separate non-profit corporation, wholly owned by the member leagues. CUNA Supply serves credit unions through the league supply departments or directly from Madison, Wisconsin, or Toronto, Ontario.

Cuna Mutual Insurance Society

The CUNA Mutual Insurance Society is the credit union insurance company. It serves credit unions and their members with an insurance program wholly oriented to the purposes and objectives of the credit union movement, including Loan Protection and Life Savings insurance. CUNA Mutual is a separate corporation, affiliated with CUNA. As a mutual company it returns all income after operating expenses and reserves to its policyowners in the form of dividends.

Why Employers Approve of Credit Unions

Over two-thirds of all credit unions serve employee groups. Management overwhelmingly supports credit unions because of the many benefits derived by company and workers alike. Among these are:

- Garnishments, loan requests, and pay advances drop sharply after a credit union begins operations in a plant. Workers who have financial difficulties are referred to the credit union. This saves management time, money, and headaches.
- Credit unions are good for employee relations. Surveys show that workers rate the credit union above other benefits.
- Financial worries rank high as causes of accidents, absenteeism, poor work, personnel directors report. A credit union helps employees solve their financial problems. They can borrow what they need without loss of dignity or self-respect.
- Serving as volunteer directors in the credit union gives employees first-hand experience and insight into business problems that make them more valuable employees.
- Employees take personal responsibility for their own financial affairs. Management doesn't have to get involved with a man's personal problems when the credit union handles them. Since the credit union is a separate corporation owned and operated entirely by the employees, the company has no legal or financial responsibility for it.

How to Organize a Credit Union

1. Any group of 100 or more people (50 in some cases) may qualify for starting a credit union provided they have some clear tie or relationship that holds the group together. It may be the place where they work, or where they live. It may be the church where they worship, or an organization to which they belong.

2. To get the help and basic information needed, contact your league, or write CUNA at the address below. Free literature will be sent. Also, an experienced league representative will answer your questions and guide you in working out the necessary details of the organization process.

3. Study the literature and discuss it with rank and file people who will give support to forming a credit union. Next get the leadership of the group to agree to the idea. This may be the employer of an industrial group, the priest or minister of a church group.

4. When the way is clear, request a meeting of the potential signers of the charter application. A wide representation from various departments or areas of the membership group is desirable.

5. In two to four weeks, a charter should be issued by the government. An organization meeting is then held to elect a board of directors, who in turn choose the officers. The league representative will assist at this meeting and afterwards will help train the new officers in their duties.

For further information, consult your league. If there is no league in your area, write directly to:

RURAL PROBLEMS

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS AND SMALL FARMERS IN 1965

REPORT TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND
by Fay Bennett, Executive Director

"There still lies ahead the establishment for migrant farm labor of the standards of both decency and efficiency which are characteristic of other employment in this country."

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz in Year of Transition: Seasonal Farm Labor, 1965

"I used to wonder how all my white neighbors got such fine cows and fine pastures and fine tractors. I kept snooping around and I found out my white neighbors were getting loans from the government. My [county] agent hadn't told me that!"

Participant in Alabama Conference on Governmental Anti-Poverty and Other Programs to Aid Low-Income Rural People, co-sponsored by NSF

"I think I've been on strike all my days 'cause I've been suffering all my days. I don't mind suffering . . . Let me suffer till I get to the good . . . . For God's sake stop grumbling and see the thing right."

Mrs. Adkins of Shaw, Mississippi, in statewide Mississippi Freedom Labor Union Meeting, Sept. 4, 1965

The Year in Brief

1965 was a year of transition and hope for hired farm workers, of dispossession and struggle for marginal farmers. The end of dependence on foreign contract workers and the proof that domestic workers were available if jobs met minimum standards characterized the transition. Strike action and union organization marked a new militancy among farm workers. Continued mechanization made thousands of sharecroppers "expendable" and day laborers idle, as economic change was brutally speeded by evictions following voter registration and other civil rights activities. The war on poverty moved into southern rural areas but its pace lagged far behind the national effort.

Fewer and Richer Farms; Fewer and Poorer People

Between 1939 and 1964, 2.4 million farms disappeared; 95 per cent of them were small farms with less than $2,500 in annual gross sales, and about a fourth of them were worked by sharecroppers. Only about 1.5 million small farms are left now. In the same period, the number of farms with gross sales of $10,000 and more rose two and one-half times. In the South, three million people have left the land since 1940. Most of those forced off southern farms have been Negro sharecroppers and tenant farmers who have migrated to northern and western ghetto communities. (At one point they were flocking to the Watts area in Los Angeles at the rate of 1,000 a month.)

The displacement of people from southern farms may be accounted for by many factors. Chief among these is continued mechanization. Mechanical cotton pickers and grain harvesters are eliminating sharecropping in the deep South, leaving only half a million day laborers. In the Delta area, 95 per cent of the cotton will be machine-picked in 1966--in contrast with 69 per cent in 1965--and 20,000 more farm laborers will be made idle. The coming mechanization of tobacco will have a similar effect in states just to the north of the cotton belt. Across the continent in California, about a third of the 1965 tomato crop--116,000 acres--was reaped by 262 machines; in 1966, a major portion of the tomatoes will be planted for machine harvesting.

Hundreds of farmers are being dispossessed in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana for participating in civil rights activities. The dispossession of others will be speeded by the Food and Agriculture Act of 1965; in the Mississippi Delta alone, one-third of the 925,000 cotton acres will be taken out of production.

Productivity continues to rise. The labor of one farm worker supplied the farm product needs of 11 people in 1940, 15 in 1950, 26 in 1960, and 33 in 1964.

Hired Farm Workers

There are about 2.5 million households with one or more members who do some hired farm work during the year. More than half of these live below the poverty level (defined as less than $3,000 income from all sources); in this group are more than 80 per cent of the non-white families, and more than 70 per cent of the families headed by a migrant.

In 1964, the last year for which full figures are available, there were approximately 664,000 full-time farm workers in the United States and about 2.5 million seasonal workers. Of these, about 386,000 were migratory workers and 272,000 of them did 25 or more days' work during the year. In 1964, migrants worked an average of 131 days at farm and nonfarm work and earned an average of $1,240. Nearly half (44 per cent) of them did both farm and nonfarm work with average earnings of $585 at farm work and $1,049 at nonfarm work. Those who did only farm work averaged $935 in annual earnings. A special wage survey made by the Department of Labor in May, 1965, covered 1.5 million farm wage workers. Seventy per cent of them were paid less than $1.25 an hour. More than one-third (in the South, 54 per cent) were paid less than 75 cents an hour.

Safety. The National Safety Council has again branded agriculture as one of the most hazardous of all industries. In 1965, agriculture ranked below only the mining and construction industries in death rate. It had the largest total number of deaths, 3,200, and 270,000 disabling injuries.

Children. More than one-fourth of the entire hired farm working force are young people less than 17 years of age. (In 1962, farm wage worker households with less than $3,000 income included 3 million members not yet 18, about 27 per cent of all children and youth in the poverty sector.) There is as yet no national legislation to prevent child labor in agriculture outside of school hours, as there is in other industries. "Crop vacations" are common from Maine to Louisiana, nullifying the school-hour protection. In the year ending June 30, 1965, Department of Labor inspectors found 2,300 farms violating child labor laws and a total of 7,076 children under 16 working during school hours. More than half of these were in the 10-13 age bracket.

Housing and Health. Despite the existence of new government programs providing financial aid for farm labor housing, too many farm worker families still live in miserable conditions. Investigation into an alleged labor shortage in Florida last spring uncovered these conditions:

> ". . . There are no camps in Dade County with indoor plumbing for each cabin. The electrical outlet provides a bare bulb for light. . . . Sometimes burlap is the only privacy between rooms. The floors and walls are generally bare, unpainted planks. Families with 10 and 12 children can live in one two-room shack for $8 to $10 a week. . . .'A new camp would have to live up to the letter of the law,' says [one] Sanitation Inspector. . . .'That's why there are so few new camps.' "

Small wonder that migrant families are more prone to illness than others; that diarrhea is chronic among children; parasitic and fungal diseases common; neglect of teeth, eye, and ear ailments prevalent.

Foreign Workers. 1965 was the year of transition for farm labor, domestic and foreign. Mexican braceros, always the bulk of foreign contract workers, were no longer available under Public Law 78, which had expired. The challenge of attracting a sufficient number of domestic workers to replace them had to be met and, for the most part, was met. Use of foreign labor was reduced 83 per cent, from 634,000 man-months (equivalent to 52,800 full-time jobs) in 1964, to 110,000 man-months (9,200 jobs) in 1965; Mexican labor was reduced 95 per cent. In 1964, there had been 178,000 Mexican contract workers in 17 states; in 1965, there were 20,300, all in California. The use of British West Indians did not decrease proportionately. In 1964, there were 14,000; in 1965, although there were 14,100 in Florida alone, man-months dropped from 81,000 to 64,000; but there were also 1,340 BWI's working in apples and 800 in tobacco. The number of Canadians imported to New England states dropped from 8,000 in 1964 to 4,484 in 1965--3,627 in potatoes and 857 in apples. Of the 1,080 Japanese and 110 Filipinos in the United States at the end of 1964, 200 Japanese remained by the end of 1965. All of the temporary workers imported in 1965 came in under P. L. 414, the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Average hourly wages for farm workers rose from $1.08 to $1.14, the largest one-year increase since the Korean War. Crop values were up even in the three crops--asparagus, strawberries, and pickle cucumbers--where crop losses may have been attributable in part to labor shortages. The price of fresh fruits and vegetables went down in 1965 (by 4.5 per cent, comparing November, 1964, to November, 1965), while the Consumer Price Index rose 1.7 per cent.

Farm Worker Organization

Large-scale militant union activity among farm workers developed in 1965 in widely separated parts of the country.

Cotton choppers and pickers, paid $2.50 or $3.00 for a 10-hour day, formed 90 per cent of the membership of the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union; but they were joined by tractor drivers, haulers, domestic servants, part-time carpenters, mechanics, handymen, former sharecroppers, and renters. The MFLU demands were for a $1.25 an hour minimum wage, an 8½-hour day with time-and-a-half for overtime, sick pay, health and accident insurance, and equal employment practices. Evicted strikers and croppers set up a tent city. If MFLU cannot bring the huge plantation owners to the bargaining table, it may at least focus national attention on the need for alternatives for the poor people of the cotton country.

The grape strike broke out after Filipino workers returned from Coachella Valley, California, where they had received $1.40 an hour plus an incentive piece rate, to Delano where wages were $1.25 and the incentive smaller. They called for help from the AFL-CIO's Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee. When employers refused to discuss wages, working conditions, and a union contract, between six and eight hundred workers struck. Within two weeks, 1,200 Mexican-Americans, organized in the National Farm Workers Association, joined them. Harrassment and arrests by employers and local authorities were constant. The strike continued from the picking season into pruning, the beginning of the next crop year. (In 1966, Schenley Industries has recognized the union and the Di Giorgio Corporation has suggested an election.)

Other areas were affected. At Lantana, on the East Coast of Florida, 14 farm workers struck, demanding a wage increase, but lost; just south of Lantana a strike was averted when demands were met. A wage increase was secured in the Pompano Beach area by a strike threat coupled with a labor shortage. A five-day strike of 800 British West Indian cane cutters at the Okeelanta Sugar Refinery was lost. The Steelworkers union organized Cypress Gardens Citrus Products, Inc., of Eloise, Florida's largest multi-purpose citrus plant, as the beginning of an organizing drive. In Louisiana, the Fish, Seafood, Agricultural and Allied Workers Union No. 300 secured for Gulf Coast pogy boatmen their first over-all pay increase in 25 years. Local 300, affiliated with the Amalgamated Meat Cutters, includes dairy, sugar, and rice workers in addition to the fishermen.

Legislation

Congress moved slowly in 1965 on bills which proposed coverage for farm workers under minimum wage requirements, child labor regulations, collective bargaining guarantees, and unemployment compensation. Although both Senate and House worked on separate, similar bills, only one piece of legislation --a House proposal to include farm laborers under minimum wage coverage--was reported favorably out of Committee, but it did not come up for a vote before the session ended. (In March, 1966, a new minimum wage bill was reported favorably out of Committee.) In September, 1965, a proposal to transfer the authority to import foreign workers in times of domestic labor shortage from the Labor Secretary to the Agriculture Secretary was narrowly defeated.

More action was seen in state legislatures than in some years. Five states strengthened regulations governing housing and sanitary conditions. California enacted the first law requiring employers to provide sanitary facilities in the fields. Texas now requires a tuberculosis examination for persons seeking migratory work. Florida and Michigan set safety standards for motor vehicles used to transport migratory workers, and California improved its vehicle code. North Dakota deleted the exemption for agricultural workers from its minimum wage law, but Michigan suspended coverage of certain agricultural operations. New Jersey broadened its wage payment and collection law to include agricultural workers. Maine, Michigan, New Hampshire, and Oregon amended workmen's compensation laws to provide some coverage for agricultural workers.

Federal Programs

Farmers Home Administration. In 1965 FHA loaned more than $798 million to help 12,186 farm families buy, enlarge, or develop farms; gave short-term operating credit to 118,000; assisted more than 12,000 with antipoverty loans; loaned $13 million which provided new or improved housing for more than 5,500 rural persons aged 62 and older; and gave credit assistance to 388 rural communities to construct water systems. Unfortunately, however, generations of discrimination have produced such inequalities that many Negro farmers cannot now meet qualifications for loans. In several Southern states, little change is yet visible. The number of farmers who have applied but not received loans is not known, and others have not even applied either because they do not know how or because they are sure they will be rejected.

ASCS. According to Department of Agriculture reports as of December 30, 1965, in the 1965 Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service elections 12,471 Negroes were on the ballot for various offices in 14 southern states. None was elected either member or first alternate to a County Committee but five were elected second alternates. On the Community Committees, 85 were elected regular members, 131 first alternates, and 303 second alternates. Without members on County Committees, Negro farmers still lack the effective representation needed to change traditional discriminatory policies. Reports from Deep South states indicate that in some areas elected Negro members are not being notified of Community Committee meetings or allowed to participate in their activities.

Office of Economic Opportunity. The Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 made possible, under Title III-B, programs for farm workers in education, sanitation, day care, and self-help housing. In 1965, OEO granted some $26 million in Title III-B funds to 65 public and private nonprofit organizations in 20 states. Around 350 VISTA volunteers are working with migrants. Under EOA's rural loan programs, nearly 25,000 rural families received $36.5 million in 13 months (including January, 1966), and in southern states, nearly 40 per cent of the family loans have been made to Negro borrowers. OEO has financed small machinery cooperatives, and more than half of these are made up partly or entirely of Negro farmers. EOA made possible additional projects under Community Action Program auspices, but the most impoverished communities--mainly in the rural South--have received the least antipoverty funds, because they lack the organization and technical help needed to initiate projects.

Training Programs. Since 1962, more than 20,000 persons have been trained in agricultural skills under the Manpower Development and Training Act and the Area Redevelopment Act. Training is also given in basic literacy skills and for nonfarm occupations in areas where workers are needed. Hundreds of thousands are in need of such training as their old agricultural occupations are disappearing.

A Program for Rural America

The crises of American cities and farms, so different on the surface, are inextricably bound together. Dramatic evidence is the annual migration of a million people from rural to urban areas.

Remedial programs are needed to raise the living standards of rural people: inclusion of farm workers in all the protections of social legislation that benefit industrial workers; increased programs of loans and technical assistance to enable small farmers to remain on the land and to raise their income levels.

But beyond that, a program is needed large enough to meet the human needs of the rural areas:

* A million new rural homes are needed in the next ten years, and two and one-half million homes need major repairs.
* Rural medical, hospital, nursing, and dental services must be brought up to urban standards.
* Educational facilities must be increased at least to urban levels, requiring a 40 per cent greater investment in education, including construction of approximately 50,000 new classrooms.
* 30,000 rural town water and sewage systems are needed.

Vocational training and remedial education are needed to equip people for employment in these construction and development projects. The training of professionals to staff increased facilities will call for a steadily expanding number of educators and educational institutions. Following the basic medical and educational services should come a host of other social, cultural, and recreational facilities and personnel.

From a quarter to a half million new jobs could be created to meet the basic and expanding needs of the rural areas. On the basis of the new job-created incomes, the disappearing small towns of stagnating rural economies will become thriving small cities with new needs, new construction, new business, in a spiraling cycle of activity.

National Sharecroppers Fund

*has field representatives in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Tennessee, helping poverty-stricken people to help themselves, bringing knowledge of federal assistance programs available, and working to end discrimination in their implementation. (Four representatives work under the Rural Advancement Project, NSF's cooperative program with the Southern Regional Council and the State Councils on Human Relations.)

*set up the Southern Rural Training Project under contract with the Department of Labor to stimulate and develop training programs for the hard-core rural poor.

*carried on a crash five-month Farm Labor Counseling Program to advise unemployed rural poor about criteria farm jobs, training opportunities, and other means of increasing their employability and income.

*works to end the exclusion of agricultural workers from the protections and benefits of social legislation that other workers enjoy, and to protect them from the unfair competition of foreign contract labor.

*supports the efforts of farm workers in organizing unions and low-income farmers in organizing cooperatives.

*works with government and other private agencies to help low-income rural people secure a better life.

Rural Problems

April 8, 1966

Memorandum on Policy and Program to End Poverty in Rural America

NOTE: The Board of Directors of the National Sharecroppers Fund at its February, 1966, meeting heard a presentation of the needs and potentialities of rural areas by a government agricultural expert. After discussion by Board members about the relative public and private investment required; how to avoid poverty-scale living; how areas could be developed without the entrance of industry; and problems of uneconomic farming; the following statement of problems and policies was evolved.

In twentieth century America, rural and urban society are rapidly becoming one in people, economy, and development.

In rural America, with a population of 55.4 million, 600,000 young people annually are seeking work both on and off the farms. But at present no new job opportunities are being created in the rural areas. Adding to these young people the others who are displaced by continuing advances in agricultural technology, the result is a forced migration of about a million people annually out of the rural areas.

The current Mississippi crisis, with evicted families sleeping-in in government facilities in Mississippi and camping-in in Washington to dramatize their plea for aid, is only one indication of a continuing dilemma. For every 1,000 acres of cotton that is mechanized and weeded with chemicals, a "surplus" of 50 rural families is created. Cotton in the southeastern states is presently 60 per cent modernized and may reach 90 per cent this year. Furthermore, the old South is expected to lose one-third of its cotton acreage base because of market conditions and competition from Arizona, Texas and California. Within 10 years, the by-product will be more than 300,000 "surplus" families in 16 Southern states. When the whole rural economy is considered, this process will send 45 million displaced "surplus" people to the cities in the next few decades. An additional three million families may be forced out of farming and other rural employment because of the deterioration of the rural economy over the same period.

Most of the migrating people are poor. In fact, almost half of the nation's people who live below the poverty level are in rural areas, yet they are receiving less assistance from the anti-poverty program than other parts of the country; only about 10 per cent of OEO funds are thus far spent in rural areas. Thus, without help to climb out of poverty where they are, the rural poor move to the cities and, unskilled and ill-educated, swell the ranks of the urban poor. They move into already crowded ghettos, increasing existing tension, raising social and financial costs, and bringing civil disorder nearer.

Urban poverty cannot be ended until poverty is ended at its source, the blighted countryside.

This is not essentially a race problem. More than two-thirds of the displaced families will be white, the rest Negro. But the Negroes are usually forced out first because centuries of deprivation and discrimination have made their hold on land, jobs and homes so marginal.

Meanwhile, the over-all national population increase in the next 35 years will be about 150 million people. Our 210 cities cannot hold them. An expansion of the rural economy to support rural population increase, plus a merging of the urban society into the rural sector, is necessary for accommodation of the expected new millions. There is at present no evidence of adequate long- or short-range planning for the social and economic adjustments necessitated by this population expansion and migration.

The rural problem, most crucially evident in the destitution of rural people, is actually a problem of all American society because an inability to revitalize the rural economy will paralyze necessary expansion of the entire economy. A policy of drift that assumes, for instance, a doubling of New York's population from 10 to 20 million without any plans for meeting the situation is incompatible with American social and political objectives and aspirations and, indeed, with the survival of democracy itself.

An important political aspect of the population shift is an expected attrition of farm voting base to only one per cent in 1980. It has already dropped from 18 per cent in 1945 to six per cent in 1966. This means a comparable shift of political and legislative responsibility to urban people who must now understand and write both farm and rural legislation. Considering the potential saving of excessive welfare costs, urban redevelopment costs, and tax losses from people with no income, urban people have a vital interest in developing an expanding economic base for people in rural areas.

The search for realistic public policies to meet the crisis depends first on rejection of the ideas that (a) drifting will solve the problem; (b) the problem cannot be solved; or (c) that 1930-65 policies and public programs may suffice. Whoever offers programs adequate for expansion of the total economy, rural and urban, and to serve the basic needs of the people, should win the elections from 1968 to 2000. The effective political force behind these ideas must be city-based, but supplemented by creative rural leadership and the dynamics of the civil rights movement in America.

Significant components of such a program for American rural development should include:

1. Construction of one million new rural houses and the major repair of $2\frac{1}{2}$ million dilapidated ones during the next ten years. This should create 250,000 new jobs annually, plus employment of vocational and craft teachers who will be needed to help create a skilled labor force.

2. Creation of medical, hospital, nursing and dental services for rural people up to the urban standard. This should create another 10,000 new jobs a year. Training and scholarships for education in medical and dental service fields are needed.

3. Improvement of the rural education service by building 50,000 new class-rooms and investing 40 per cent more in rural education. This should create 10,000 additional new jobs a year. The new occupational capacity, with new employment, will create a new tax base to recover the costs.

4. Planning, engineering and construction of 30,000 rural town water and sewer systems. This should create 18,000 new jobs annually. It will fulfill the nation's commitment to raise the rural living environment up to the existing urban level.

5. The vocational training and remedial education services needed to prepare people for work on these construction and development projects will employ about 20,000 skilled personnel annually.

The entire project is financially solvent, since new incomes will create both a loan repayment base and an adequate new tax base to recover public costs. A tax-paying man will exist for every $50,000 of new trade, and ample new trade is in sight. The public investment needed is $6 billion a year, all recoverable, with Congress and the Treasury Department acting as the banker.

Private investment of $10 billion directed to rural areas, out of $80 billion invested annually in total national capital expansion, will be needed to expand the rural economy sufficiently, including construction of about 200 new medium-sized rural cities to accommodate population increases.

A re-direction of 2½ per cent of urban-consumer spending toward purchase of rural commodities, instead of city-manufactured commodities, will be required to restore American agriculture to a solvent basis. This investment will be recovered in national tax income and avoidance of excessive welfare, crime, delinquency, and urban service costs.

The alternative to such a program is a growing rate of institutional poverty whose total social cost would be about $40,000 per dependent family in a large city.

New rural city development without an industrial base is a creative possibility in this program. The existing policy of rural-city development around transplanted industries or so-called "industrial nodes" requires re-examination. Work force needs are declining in basic manufacturing, and the national employment expansion is in the field of occupations in which people serve each other. This phenomenon makes it possible to locate a planned rural city any where with a sound economy based on service occupations, such as trade, recreation, property maintenance, medical service, education, baby sitting, construction to serve expanding population, transport, and cultural activities.

If an industry is needed and feasible, mobile power units can be available to locate the industry anywhere that it is desired. For example, if a new rural city is desired in Southern Alabama, technological trade and employment resources make this possible. Relatives may visit relatives in any 100-mile radius. Jobs may exist nearby the residences of working people who will commute to their jobs.

Only such a development program can lay the basis for eliminating poverty permanently in the United States. The minimum annual saving will be the $2 billion which poverty is estimated to cost the nation.

The fear that an adequate program for rural development cannot be financed due to competition for funds for military purposes is unjustified. The war in Viet Nam, costing $18 billion annually, is still only a subordinate expenditure in a $700 billion national economy. The financing of such a war should not impair the steady development of the American economy or the rendering of ever-greater services to an expanding population. The only really wrong policy would be to stop expansion and curtail services. A vigorous America requires healthy, well-educated, and usefully-employed citizens.

RURAL PROBLEMS

Half of Nation's Poor Are Down on the Farm

EDITOR'S NOTE — City slums are spectacular, but half the nation's poor are down on the farm. The fight on rural poverty has just begun, and already it is plain—the problems are immense, and progress will be slow. But the fight goes on—against bad schooling, big families, racial antipathy and the flight to the slums.

By ARTHUR EDSON

FRIENDSHIP, Tenn., May 7 (AP)—She dropped out of school during the fifth grade, and at 14 married a sturdy young man of 20 who had reckoned that six years of education were plenty.

Now, nine years later, Mr. and Mrs. Ray Sharp still live in these rolling hills of Crockett county in Western Tennessee. Sharp gets his house rent free and $6 a day as a farm worker — on days when farm work is wanted.

Yet their future looks moderately promising because they and the federal government are allies in a small but enthusiastic war on poverty. Their poverty.

"I've cut 'taters' till I look like one," Olene Sharp said cheerfully after helping slice 400 pounds of seed potatoes.

Under the poverty program, the Sharps got a $1,940 loan so they could buy a second-hand truck, a small tractor, a chain saw.

WHEN OTHER work isn't available, Sharp can tend his own cabbage, sweet corn and potatoes. And, by cutting posts and doing hauling jobs, he made $700 during the winter. Not spectacular, maybe, but manna to the Sharps whose income previously had been $700 for an entire year.

No longer is Sharp alarmed when no job is available.

"On my own, I'll make right smart more," he said. "Before that loan, I couldn't move, so I just sit."

The chances appear good that the Sharps will repay the $1,490 they owe the nation's taxpayers, plus the 4⅛ per cent interest.

In her modest but tidy home, chatting with her sister-in-law, Patsy Jean Warren, from Frog Jump, Tenn., Mrs. Sharp looked confidently ahead.

Farmers Home Administrator, described what happens:

"The average out-migrant finds himself only qualified for the unskilled labor market. He has a lack of culture needed for city living, and he goes into the slum areas and on to the welfare rolls."

Because violent disagreements rage over even simple definitions, any discussion of the poor runs into dismaying problems.

AT WHAT precise point do you become poor? The Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) says a family of four needs an annual income of $3,140 if it's in a city or $2,190 if it's in a rural area.

Do the impoverished want work? Or do they prefer welfare?

Is President Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty designed to raise incomes of the poor or is it, as some Republicans claim, neatly arranged to help the politicians in an ly in the rural South. So a visitor, familiar with the stories of violence and hatreds, is understandably surprised at evidences of inter-racial cooperation.

Take Clarksdale, Miss., Coahoma county seat in the fertile Mississippi river delta.

As the richest cities maintain the vilest slums, so the richest farm lands are surrounded by some of the most forlorn poor. An Agriculture Department map, with a dot for each 500 poor rural families, shows poverty in all 50 states, but along the lower Mississippi the dots are so thick they become solid black.

KING COTTON is blamed. Once this nation planted 40 million acres of cotton. Because of new fertilizers and technology, plus competition from synthetics, cotton acreage has been whacked to 10.5 million acres, this year's cuts alone will affect another 1,000 workers in Coahoma county.

standing vacant, but now it rattled with the excitement of 101 pre-school youngsters, all from families of the very poor.

SAMPLE COMMENTS from teachers on its integrated faculty:

"One little boy had never seen a toy before. He didn't do anything the first day but stand around and look."

"That girl gets hysterical whenever a man approaches. I don't know what terrible experience she has had."

"I was surprised at what these children couldn't do. One couldn't ride a tricycle, and one couldn't eat with a spoon."

"Those two little boys don't have shoes" — the morning was chilly — "but the bus driver said the mother didn't have shoes either."

SUNFLOWER SCHOOL is in a poor white community, but during its first week not one white child enrolled.

The hope is that white mothers, noting the two free meals a day and the free medical examinations, will be lured into sending their children, too.

Coahoma Opportunities also provides legal aid, a credit union, a job development program and adult education for seasonal workers.

It is far too soon to judge if it is accomplishing anything, but it is not too soon to realize how immense are the difficulties.

Bennie Gooden, who became assistant executive director of the Clarksdale Project after a stint as teacher in a Negro junior college, lists these reasons for the slow start in the South:

—Racial antipathies remain strong in the country. "A lot of communities aren't ready to comply with civil rights requirements."

—Many of the more competent Negroes, who might have given leadership, have fled the South.

—Apathy abounds.

—Practically, there are few places to meet in rural areas. Country churches usually are the rallying point, but many don't have basements and there's a reluctance to use the sanctuary itself.

ABOVE all, Gooden claims, the administration anti-poverty plan has a glaring flaw bert Gillespie. He took in $500 last year, his farm expenses came to $1,000 and he has a family of eight.

Farm mechanization has perhaps made least headway with fresh produce. This gives the poor a chance to provide the required hand labor, but presents an additional problem: Perishables must be sold quickly.

Again, cooperatives supply an answer, with government loans available to build the huge sheds where participating farmers can peddle their wares to wholesalers.

John F. Knox, the Farmers Home supervisor in Forrest City, Ark., says of the poor in his area: "They're not stupid, but they're not too well educated. You didn't need much education to deal with a mule."

HERE, as in other rural counties all over the nation, the population has been steadily eroding. "You don't realize it until you have a funeral," Knox said. "Half the survivors are from California and the other half are from Illinois."

How do you stop this constant draining away of the rural population? (Last year, as usual, another 100,000 family farms quietly disappeared.)

Curiously, one problem that vexes many large cities also bothers hamlets. Both may have inadequate water supplies.

The residents of Pulaski, Ill., are using a $116,000 government loan to dig two wells and install a filtering system. This Southern Illinois town once had 700 to 800 population; now it's dwindled to around 400.

ROY CRAIG, the Farmers Home supervisor from Anna, Ill., was saying: "The trouble with your wells is that they are shallow and polluted."

The town clerk, Bill Heilig, agreed. "That's the billy goat from tail to the horns," he said.

Mayor James L. Curry, who runs the general store, says any small industry hunting a plant site begins by asking, how is your water supply?

So until it gets water the town not only will lack industry, but also every time there is a fire the truck will roar up and pour on water for exactly four minutes. That's how long it takes to exhaust the water in the truck's tank.

BUT IT'S the poor, as individuals, who keep coming to mind.

M. L. Graham, a Negro farmer near Pulaski . . . This father of 11 was feeling so poorly last year that his wife handled the cotton crop. On the day he was to have a prostate operation his house burned to the ground. His cotton was sold for around $300, and here came M. L. Graham to pay the government the $150 he owed it.

"I never hated to take a man's money so much in my life," Roy Craig said.

"IF YOU PROMISE a person a thing, you got to stick to your word," Graham said.

Julius J. Berry of Mound City, Ill. — Reversing the trend, Berry moved his wife and four children from the Negro slums of Chicago. "I knew where we lived," Julius said, "that when the kids got big enough they'd be on dope before they were 10 years old."

Berry got a $1,020 loan for a truck and welding torch so that he could cut up junk and sell it.

He and his wife both believe in hustle. She made $171 in a sewing factory and with this, set up Doris' cafe, where one of the specialties of the house, so the sign says, is "chittilings." They also have gone into the grocery business.

MRS. BERRY is indignant because wholesalers are reluctant to do business with her. "I gave one man a $25 order and paid him cash, but he never came back."

truck, a small tractor, a chain saw.

WHEN OTHER work isn't available, Sharp can tend his own cabbage, sweet corn and potatoes. And, by cutting posts and doing hauling jobs, he made $700 during the winter. Not spectacular, maybe, but manna to the Sharps whose income previously had been $700 for an entire year.

No longer is Sharp alarmed when no job is available.

"On my own, I'll make right smart more," he said. "Before that loan, I couldn't move, so I just sit."

The chances appear good that the Sharps will repay the $1,490 they owe the nation's taxpayers, plus the 4⅛ per cent interest.

In her modest but tidy home, chatting with her sister-in-law, Patsy Jean Warren, from Frog Jump, Tenn., Mrs. Sharp looked confidently ahead.

SHE SAID she hopes her 2-year-old daughter will stay in school longer than she did and thus be better equipped to face a world which no longer has any use for the unlettered and the unskilled.

With 35 million poor around, the Sharps don't mean much statistically, but they do illustrate two important points:

—Increasingly, those who work directly with the poor seem to be concluding that there will be no spectacular breakthroughs, that if progress is made it will be by small, personal gains like the Sharps (balanced, of course, by disheartening losses).

—The belief prevails, at least in some areas, that while city slums attract nearly all the attention, and, so far, most of the money, the key to poverty remains in rural America. Even though this has become an urban nation, half of its poor live in the country.

THE CITY'S woes can never be solved, so this theory goes, so long as the country poor surge in like lemmings from farm and hamlet, maybe looking for better jobs, maybe counting on bigger relief checks.

In folklore the bumpkin was a joke; in reality he's a disaster.

In a recent Washington interview, Howard Bertsch, the Winter Earnings Made a Big Difference

Farmers Home Administrator, described what happens:

"The average out-migrant finds himself only qualified for the unskilled labor market. He has a lack of culture needed for city living, and he goes into the slum areas and on to the welfare rolls."

Do the impoverished want work? Or do they prefer welfare?

Is President Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty designed to raise incomes of the poor or is it, as some Republicans claim, neatly arranged to help the politicians in an election year?

Has this nation drifted too near the welfare state? Or is it — as some of the poor protest by booing anti-poverty boss Sargent Shriver and by camping out across from the White House — too late with too little?

IN THIS swirling controversy it's easy to forget the main point: that human beings are involved — the poor and those trying to help them — and that human beings rarely fit pat theories.

Already one theory — that the poor are poor credit risks — is taking a beating.

The Farmers Home Administration can make what are called economic opportunity loans of up to $2,500 to individuals so poor no bank could afford the risk. Their repayments have been surprisingly prompt.

William R. McIntosh, the Farmers Home Supervisor responsible for the loan to the Sharps, says only six of his 35 loans of this type may be in arrears.

In one vital respect, the Sharps are lucky.

THEY ARE white, in a strongly segregationist county.

Poverty and civil rights are closely intertwined, especially in the rural South. So a visitor, familiar with the stories of violence and hatreds, is understandably surprised at evidences of inter-racial cooperation.

Take Clarksdale, Miss., Coahoma county seat in the fertile Mississippi river delta.

As the richest cities maintain the vilest slums, so the richest farm lands are surrounded by some of the most forlorn poor. A private corporation, Coahoma Opportunities, Inc., using mostly federal funds, has been set up to struggle with these problems.

Under federal law, the corporation must be integrated, a haunting problem in a county where the color line has been resolutely drawn and where the blacks outnumber the whites, 68 per cent to 32.

The corporate board now has 13 whites and 13 Negroes, but life hasn't been simple.

At one point 11 white board members quit simultaneously, and it may not be merely a coincidence that Gus Roessler, its white executive director and a cheerleader for this section's future, is a native of Pennsylvania.

YET ON A trip to inspect a school project, Andrew Carr, who owns a 2,500 acre plantation, piled matter of factly into the rear seat next to Aaron Henry, president of Mississippi's national Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People. Carr is president of Coahoma Opportunities; Henry is a board member and one of its organizers.

"All my life," Carr said, "I have been interested in upgrading people."

ABOVE all, Gooden claims, the administration anti-poverty plan has a glaring flaw that may account for the poor's unrest or even rebellion.

A man whose job has suddenly disappeared, Gooden says, can't whip up much enthusiasm for long range planning.

"He needs a job and he needs it now," Gooden said. "Maybe we should have some sort of WPA, like we had in New Deal days."

Farming is big business, requiring complicated and expensive machinery. No poor man could ever hope to own a mechanical cotton picker, which can cost from $10,000 to $15,000.

BY FORMING cooperatives, poor farmers can get government loans to buy equipment that they can share, through such as the Hamilton-Stovall Cotton Picking Assn. near Aberdeen, Miss. Its membership is integrated and Willie J. Morgan, a Negro, is its president.

Although farmers are notoriously independent, last year's cotton was harvested amicably, with weekly meetings to decide whose turn was next.

"Maybe you would think these people don't have the ability to lead," Roy F. Robison, Farmers Home supervisor in Aberdeen, said. "Well, it's amazing how they can get together and conduct their meetings. They all organize in churches, and no matter how big a hurry they're in they always start with a prayer."

THE MINUTES of the Athens, Miss., Cotton Picker Assn., a cooperative made up of 25 Negro farmers, prove this.

William E. Walker, its secretary, reported on March 9:

"The board of directors met at home of Willie T. Bumpass, the majority of board members present. Eddie Carlisle led in singing, 'This Little Light of Mine,' and offered prayer."

The association borrowed $56,900 to buy three cotton pickers, some wagons and a shed. Their individual yearly incomes show the magnitude of their investment: After paying farm expenses, Bumpass had $900 left for his family of three, Carlisle had $1,100 for two and Walker $900 for four.

AT THAT, they did far better than another member, Al-

PROBLEMS OF NEGRO MIGRATION FROM RURAL TO URBAN AREAS IN THE SOUTH

RURAL PROBLEMS

Guideline Questions

A. Rural to Urban Migration
   1. What programs, public or private, now exist for easing the transition of Southern Negroes from rural to urban life?
   2. How, where, and by whom should such programs be instituted if they do not now exist?
   3. Whatis the potential or effectiveness of such proposals or programs in being as literacy and job training programs, relocation grants, relocation centers in both rural and urban areas, county agents, and home demonstration programs in cities for newcomers?
   4. How may Negroes in the following categories who wish to continue living in the rural South most effectively be assisted?
      a. Working age marginal farm operators who might be able to build long-range stability through loans and technical assistance.
      b. Tenant farmers and displaced farm workers who, with technical and financial assistance, might be able to engage in cooperative farming and marketing.
      c. Dependent rural residents who, because of age or disability, are least equipped to make the transition to urban life and who might be maintained at decent living levels in the rural setting with which they are most familiar.

B. The Migrant Worker
   1. What is the present economic, social, and legal status of the migrant worker?
   2. What public and private agencies have or should have programs most closely related to the problems of migrant workers?
   3. What are now the action priorities for migrant workers?

C. Public Education on the Problems
   1. Would it or would it not be useful to have a series of local, state, or regional meetings on rural problems? If so, under what auspices, and who should participate?
   2. In addition to such meetings, would it be useful to have a national meeting on rural problems? If so, under whose auspices, and who should participate?
   3. To what degree is the general public now being educated to the non-headline problems of the rural South, or to the rural to urban migrant?
   4. How might such public information be facilitated?

D. General Questions

1. Where economic development or planning units have been set up in the South at the local, state, or regional levels, to what degree are Negroes:
   a. represented at policy level; staff level; advisory level?
   b. regarded as a "public" whose assistance and understanding is solicited?
   c. regarded as a significant element in the work force?
2. To the degree that Negroes are not involved, how may they become involved?
3. What Federal Agencies are now most active (through their programs) in the South?
4. Which of these programs have the most potential for Negroes in the South?
5. What lines of communication have these Agencies established with Negroes?
6. How might such communication be established where it does not exist, or be made more effective where it does?
7. To what degree are Negroes represented in the Southern program of these Agencies: at the policy level; at the state level; at the advisory level?
8. To what degree do these Agencies regard Negroes as a significant "public"?

RURAL Opportunities

Vol. 1, No. 3

Editorial

There is the Law...

A tenant farmer receives an eviction notice from land that he has worked for over 20 years. . . .

A rural housewife signs up for what she is told are free samples and finds that what she really did was to obligate herself on a promissory note for $520. . . .

A farm owner seeks an F.H.A. loan on the dilapidated home that has served his family for three generations. He is refused because he cannot produce a clear title to the property. . . .

Multiply these problems a thousand-fold to get some indication of the legal needs of the rural poor of this country. These people daily face situations involving legal conflicts—a dispute with the creditor seeking to collect on a usurious loan, a challenge to the welfare worker who wrongfully cuts off benefits, an argument with the landlord over obligations under a lease.

Now, at last, the Federal Government is providing resources to meet the legal needs of the rural poor through the Legal Services Program of the Office of Economic Opportunity. Under this program, OEO finances local groups who provide free legal services for low-income residents. In urban areas, these services are generally provided by neighborhood law offices located in the heart of target areas. In sparsely populated areas, new and different methods must be utilized, such as circuit-riding lawyers, who travel from town to town on a fixed schedule, or a portable law office outfitted into a van that travels the rural areas in the same manner as roving X-ray and other public health units.

Unfortunately, the number of rural programs lags behind programs in urban areas. Substantial grants, however, have been made for programs to aid farm workers in California and Florida. Rural residents of Montana will be serviced by a program sponsored by the State bar; low-income residents of the sparse country of Michigan's Upper Peninsula will receive free legal services from an OEO-funded program. Other rural programs are being processed and hopefully will be funded shortly.

Equal justice under law must be a reality for the poor as well as the more economically fortunate. It must be a reality no matter where a person lives. That is the primary objective of the Legal Services Program of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

E. CLINTON BAMBERGER, JR.
Director, Legal Services Program

RURAL CALIFORNIA GETS $1.3 MILLION FOR LEGAL SERVICES

The first legal services program to operate specifically and solely for the needs of the rural poor has been funded by an OEO grant of $1,276,138 to the California Rural Legal Assistance, Inc. The CRLA will establish 10 law offices to provide legal services for low-income persons in the rural areas of California.

A private, nonprofit corporation, the CRLA is directed by a representative board, including farm laborers, bar associations, law schools and representatives of the business community and ethnic groups. It is jointly sponsored by the Neumeyer Foundation and the American Friends Service Committee.

The major goal of the corporation is the best possible overall legal services program which will teach the poor about their legal rights, show them how legal processes can assist them, provide them with legal advice, as well as represent them in court.

In addition to a central office in Los Angeles for administrative and research staff, ten offices will be located in the counties and will serve as regional offices. Each office will be staffed by two attorneys, four to five investigators and nonprofessional assistants, clerical staff, and two law students during the summer months. Eventually, part-time offices will be set up in other parts of the counties, with the staff in the regional offices scheduling regular office hours in each.

A LOOK AT NORTHWEST NEW JERSEY COMMUNITY ACTION PROGRAM (NNJCAP)

"An area like ours has been a veritable graveyard of social effort to help the poor. We don't want to beat the drums and then find we don't have the answer. So, we are using a low-key approach . . . we expect to go slowly and show results in a couple of years and those will be to stay," stated Jack Chapman, Executive Director of the Northwest New Jersey Community Action Program.

Despite this conservative estimate, NNJCAP is being judged by many in the region as a "leader" in running a good rural-based poverty program, with a set of sound achievements to its credit in the first eight months of its existence.

Rururban

This tricounty CAP—Hunterdon, Warren and Sussex counties—covers no fewer than 1,325 square miles of beautiful rolling country, bordered by New York State on the north and Pennsylvania on the west. Once dotted with farms, it is fast becoming hemmed in on all sides by industry which displaces old economic and social patterns and community values.

NNJCAP coined the word "rururban" to describe their situation of a rural area whose economy is no longer dependent upon agriculture but rather upon manufacturing and service industries. The consequence of such a change is that there is need for fewer farmers and more demand for people with vocational skills.

Distances are a Challenge

Presently 44,000 families live in the tricounty area, 15 percent of them in the below-$3,000 income bracket. Most of the latter are scattered throughout the three counties and, as single families, live great distances from each other.

Delivering a wide spectrum of much needed services is the primary function of the NNJCAP, which employs one County Manager and four Area Representatives to reach poor persons in each of the counties.

Theirs is not an easy task. Twenty to twenty-five percent of their time is spent on the road driving from one trouble spot to the next, surveying the needs, gathering information, answering questions, filling out applications and clearing the way for the active involvement of the poor in helping themselves. So far, 1,613 families have been visited—about half of the needy families in the three counties.

Area Representatives

William Trent, a 28-year-old native of Lambertville, Hunterdon County, is one of the 12 Area Representatives in NNJCAP. Coming from a disadvantaged background himself, he understands the need for young people from limited income families to gain useful work experiences that will prepare them for the future. Trent is a tall, slim, soft-spoken Negro with two years of college behind him and he hopes some day to get a bachelor's degree. In the meantime, he is guiding the antipoverty program in his area with a sure hand, and the Neighborhood Youth Corps project for 150 young people this summer is just one step in his dream of getting the community going for a youth center in Lambertville.

Area Representatives operate out of the 15 Area Service Centers in the three counties. These centers are the focal point of activity—the "meet, think and do" centers—where surveys of needs are made with the help of the local people, where many a project has been initiated, implemented and evaluated, where persons living in the vicinity can feel at ease.

Area Representatives and Area Centers are NNJCAP's answer to the challenge of distances, to the goal of reaching into poverty problems in depth.

Staff Development

Training is a significant activity in NNJCAP. The Area Representatives (most come from low-income backgrounds) and the County Managers are qualified people to start with, but by the time they get through their formal 40-hour intensive training program, biweekly training sessions and on-the-job training, they have achieved a rating of "excellent."

In addition, the Area Representatives have become familiar with local and county services and facilities available in their neighborhood. And, along the way in their training, they have developed self-confidence and organizational skills.

The training experience of NNJCAP has culminated in an overall 20-day training course called RATE (Rururban Action Training and Experience), which has been approved by the New Jersey Community Action Training Institute. NNJCAP is scheduling its first 20-day training cycle to take place next spring. Other CAAs in New Jersey plan to send their workers to NNJCAP for training.

Some Programs

The Executive staff agree that the establishment of NNJCAP has already brought about a better coordination and cooperation among the existing social service agencies. Considering that there are more than 40 welfare departments in the three counties, this is no small achievement. The benefits of this cooperation were passed on to poor persons during the successful campaign to enroll older persons in the Medicare program.

The most complicated and time-consuming endeavor so far undertaken by NNJCAP has been the processing of applications under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. There are no fewer than 74 school districts in the three counties—all independent and with different needs and interests. Processing ESEA Title I projects required 40 percent of the professional NNJCAP staff time for two months.

Summarizing the Past 8 Months

Under operating and completed projects, NNJCAP lists Program Development, Area Centers, Operation Medicare Alert, Tri-County NYC and the Riegel Child Development Center, a delegated project which operates the full-time, year-round center for 30 disadvantaged preschool children. A total of 43 persons, of whom 37 were nonprofessionals, were used in these projects.

Projects that have been approved but are not yet in operation include six Head Start follow-through programs, one summer Tri-County NYC program which provides paid work experience for 150 in-school youth and an Upward Bound project which will permit 20 high school juniors and seniors with college potential to spend the summer at Fairleigh Dickinson University for intensive academic work. Direct recipients of these combined programs number 330 persons and 58 employees will be used, including 37 nonprofessionals.

NNJCAP has 18 projects pending OEO approval. Eleven are Head Start projects. Another is SCOPE (Senior Citizens' Opportunities for Personal Enrichment), a project which would seek out and interview every person over 65 years of age, checking out their needs, planning action and provide referral services to social agencies nearby. Another project, Health Careers, would give special attention and counseling services to needy youth, steering them toward opportunities in the health professions. RATE (Rururban Action Training and Experience) would provide training for 16 Community Action workers. A one-year project, the Phillipsburg Senior Center, would provide meals, recreation and social service to senior citizens. COPE (Campership Outdoor Program of Education), a delegated project, will set up three cycles of a summer camp program for 150 boys and girls, 12 to 15 years of age. SWAT (Summer Work Advantages for Teens), would give constructive work experiences to 12 to 15-year-old youths for eight weeks. Finally, SCOTCH (Summer Cultural Opportunities for Teens and Children) would promote the musical talents of 25 disadvantaged youths, age 8 to 18 for a five-week period.

In all, the programs would employ 214 people, including 144 nonprofessionals. To date, Federal funds approved for 31 projects over the past 8 months amount to $783,965.

Chapman is proud of the program and his staff, but points out that there is still much to be done. "In an area that doesn't care too much for Federal programs, we seemed to have gotten over the first hurdles without too much resentment," comments Chapman.

Perhaps one of the reasons has been the fact that NNJCAP has drawn from the ranks of the poor to fill much of the staff needs. At the central office, located in Phillipsburg, there are four professionals and four nonprofessionals. Here is the nerve center of the entire tricounty program. The staff from all three counties assembles there every other Friday for "give and take" sessions, educational programs and discussions on CAP problems.

NINE-COUNTY TENNESSEE ACTION AGENCY PLANS MASTER CENTER PROGRAM

The Tennessee Elk River Development Agency was originally concerned with the development of natural resources in its area. Now, another dimension has been added to its concern, human resources. This has been brought about through the use of OEO programs.

TERDA represents 200,000 people in nine southern Tennessee counties: Bedford, Coffee, Franklin, Giles, Grundy, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall and Moore. Within its 41,000 square miles, there are approximately 22,000 low-income families, 46 percent of whom are well below the $3,000 poverty level.

When TERDA was chartered in 1959 to improve natural resources, its leaders recognized that the low-income families there needed help, but they had little to offer in the way of assistance. With the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, TERDA found the means whereby programs of help could be developed for this segment of its population.

Funded last June to develop a Community Action Program, the agency is now establishing a vast system of multipurpose centers close to the needy groups. The present headquarters at Fayetteville in Lincoln County serves as the master center with smaller centers to be placed in each county and subcenters in small towns and communities. Ultimately this center complex will serve as a channel through which many programs and services will flow.

All the country courts and city councils in the area are supporting the TERDA effort. For instance, local governments are providing old schools and other suitable structures for center sites. These centers and sites will furnish much of the local in-kind contributions necessary to finance the total program. Staffed with both professional and community workers, they will offer the kind of assistance and services requested by the people.

In addition to the master center and the county units, there will be 128 of the subcenters located among the people to be served. The local advisory committees drawn from the largest audience are helping to determine the kinds of programs which will be offered at the centers. Among those suggested to date are day-care and pre-school centers for the very young, education, training, and employment for adults, medicare and other assistance for the aging.

The multipurpose center complex, under the Community Action program, will serve as an overall structure through which other programs will be initiated and operated. Agency leaders foresee the creation of several small enterprises as a means toward increasing incomes of individuals and groups, enterprises that will support the establishment of cooperatives and credit unions. Resources are adequate for the development of many small businesses, such as pulpwood and fence posts factories, honey and syrup production, and tourist attractions of fishing and hunting.

Four agency staff members, James Lemons, Robert Marshall, Ralph Mitchell and Mark Whitaker, have visited Washington seeking more information and assistance toward further enterprise and program development. They are determined to have the program succeed and have met with many officials from various agencies.

UPWARD BOUND GETS GOING

This summer, selected rural youngsters will get a new lease on learning by participating in the OEO pre-college program, Upward Bound, at 74 colleges, junior colleges and high schools with residential facilities.

In all, more than 20,000 boys and girls from cities, towns and rural areas will be taking part in the 8-week program, which will be conducted by 223 colleges, universities and secondary schools. OEO has allocated $25 million for the full 12-month program.

Community Action Agencies, including 109 in rural areas, have helped to refer students to Upward Bound.

In addition to a morning schedule of academic subjects, students will go on field trips to museums, historical sites, parks, business and government offices, visit theaters and concerts, study foreign languages, and have workshops on art, drama, and journalism.

Graduate and undergraduate college students, as well as professional teachers, will serve as tutors and counselors. Volunteers are still needed in many programs and should apply to the participating colleges.

According to OEO Director Sargent Shriver, America's greatest waste of talent is "the loss of skill and exceptional minds of those young people who are capable of going to college but cannot do so because of the psychological, social and physical conditions of poverty." The aim of Upward Bound is to encourage these young people so that, in spite of a deprived background, they can succeed if they really try. Upward Bound, through individualized and unconventional methods of teaching, aims to help them make the most of their abilities.

When Upward Bound students return to school next fall, they will continue to keep in touch with their summer teachers through special classes, and also through visits to the campus. Out of 2,061 students in demonstration Upward Bound programs last summer, 1,994 are now headed for or enrolled in college.

A SHACK TODAY; A HOME TOMORROW, IN TULARE COUNTY, CALIF.

"We are still living in an old three-room house. There are eight children and my mother, which makes a total of eleven. Finding room to sleep is a problem . . . when it rains, it is difficult to find any place in the house that is dry enough to sleep. Living in a house like this is depressing, but at least I can look out of the window and see our new home being built."

So runs the testimony of Mrs. Salvador Gutierrez given in Visalia, California, before the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor in March, when Self-Help Enterprises was explained. After the hearings, Senators Robert Kennedy, Harrison Williams and George Murphy toured the Goshen, Tulare County, Self-Help Housing project.

Self-Help Housing is a program for the cooperative construction of homes for low-income farm worker families.

A forerunner of this program was begun in 1962-63 by the American Friends Service Committee, which helped Tulare County low-income families construct 24 houses. The first government financing for Self-Help Enterprises came from the Economic Opportunity Act through a grant to the Tulare County CAA. Approved in April, 1965, the grant provided technical assistance for the construction of 40 homes.

Building loans were secured through the Farmers Home Administration, while OEO funds pay for a staff of construction supervisors, community development aides and various other technical assistance personnel.

The interested families form neighborhood groups. It takes time for them to develop a relationship of mutual trust and to learn to work together using self-help methods. But they meet frequently and discuss construction procedures and building plans, and establish agreements for labor exchange (each participating family pledges 1,200 hours of labor). The whole process normally takes from 18 to 20 months.

To date, this is what has happened:

24 houses were completed under sponsorship of the American Friends Service Committee, 1962-63.

26 houses are currently under construction.

43 additional families have formed groups and have applied for FHA loans; pending approval, building will begin in the fall.

53 families have expressed interest in participating in the program and have developed informal community groups.

OEO, through Title III-B, recently funded an expansion of the earlier programs which will spread self-help housing assistance to 464 poor farm worker families throughout 6 counties of the San Joaquin Valley.

The construction of new homes is only a fraction of the net effort of the program. The participants learn the meaning of group effort, develop a sense of community and emerge from the program with a commitment to active social and political participation.

In the words of Mrs. Gutierrez' testimony: "I believe that with faith in God, and by the people working together hand in hand, we can accomplish whatever we want."

WAY OUT THERE AND BIG

Recently funded Southeast Montana Opportunity Center lays claim to being the largest community action agency in the nation. Its nine counties cover 26,597 square miles, an area larger than the combined states of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware and Maryland. The nine counties, Garfield, Prairie, Wibaux, Fallon, Custer, Carter, Powder River, Dawson and Rosebud, have an average population density of 1.7 persons per square mile.

Southeast Montana Opportunity Center is directed by Calvin Rice, a Montanan who participated in the OEO training course for rural community action technicians at the University of Wisconsin last year. The staff is now developing components for Head Start, mental health service, recreational facilities and an agricultural program.

BERTSCH PUSHES HOUSING ACTIVITIES

Farmers Home Administrator Howard Bertsch recently urged each State FHA director to review rural housing in his State and take action to make FHA housing programs more effective.

FHA, under Section 504 for rural housing, makes loans for minor building repairs and improvements essential to health and safety, and under Section 502 makes loans for families to participate in mutual self-help housing. FHA also assists elderly rural residents build, buy or improve their homes.

Mr. Bertsch made another point which is of interest to community action workers as well as FHA officials.

"In some states," he points out in his memo, "welfare agencies have increased housing allowances to families for the specific purpose of making payments on Section 504 loans. If this will result in the family's having sufficient income to meet its living expenses and also repay the loan, a Section 504 loan can be made. In case welfare agencies are not doing this in your state, we suggest you discuss this possibility with state welfare officials."

Local CAA's should follow up with local FHA supervisors to see whether this kind of assistance exists or can be made available in their communities.

HEAD START STARTED IT...

They liked what happened when they pulled together for Head Start. So, after their Office of Economic Opportunity Head Start classes ended, the citizens of "Little Hollywood" in Graham County, Arizona, mobilized for a community self-help program.

First, there was a community dinner to earn a down payment for a building site for a community center which will include a reading room and library, kitchen, classroom and meeting room.

Then, with the help of their county extension agents, they started a "people to people" informal education program to help the low-income families stretch their budgets. This has been followed by a community beautification drive, the rehabilitation of living quarters of two needy families and a half dozen other do-it-yourself community improvement projects.

MEDICARE ALERT—RURAL STATUS

Of the 4.5 million older persons contacted by CAA's for Medicare Alert, a project to enroll the elderly poor for benefits under the new Medicare Act which provides medical insurance covering most of the doctors' bills for persons over 65, an estimated 900,000 or 20 percent of the total, reside in rural areas.

Reports came in from 194 rural communities. It was found that no fewer than 11,000 of the rural Medicare Alert workers were 55 years and over and, of that number 8,750 were volunteers. The remaining 2,250, drawn from the low-income group, earned needed funds through employment in Operation Medicare Alert to supplement their incomes.

MISSOURI TERRITORY SERVED BY VISTA

In the Ozark country of southern Missouri, a 22-year-old VISTA Volunteer has been one of the key organizers and coordinators of community action programs in the area. He is Richard Klarberg of Fresh Meadows, Long Island, who along with three other VISTA Volunteers works in the seven-county Community Action Program known as the South Central Missouri Economic Opportunity Corporation. Klarberg serves as project coordinator.

The seven-county project is just beginning to come into its own. Each county started out alone a little over a year ago. Then they formed themselves into a tricounty operation. Now, finally, they have combined to make a seven-county group, consisting of Carter, Ripley, Dent, Shannon, Wayne, Butler and Reynolds counties. The CAP program serves a population of 80,000, of which 56 percent live below the poverty line.

When VISTA Volunteers first moved into the area, they conducted door-to-door surveys of the people's needs, enlisted leaders and volunteers to organize the community, set up an office as a starting point for a future neighborhood service center and helped in the drafting of proposals for the various antipoverty programs.

Klarberg, who lives alone in a cabin similar to the dwellings of the people he is attempting to help, said recently: "In this territory, up stream and down dirt roads, there are so many people whom we can't physically reach. This is our biggest problem."

Despite this handicap, the VISTA Volunteers have made progress. In cooperation with local school boards, they have started remedial reading and tutorial programs, and have helped schools set up their own libraries. Klarberg has done a particularly good job with high school dropouts in the vocational training and recreational programs organized for the youth.

Klarberg said: "We have had wonderful support from both the county officials and the community as a whole."

The Mobile Health Unit will make the rounds of the 12 community centers in Knox County so that those families who live in out-of-the-way areas can come to them and benefit from the service. Operated in cooperation with the Knox County Health Department, the new unit will be used mostly for screening, examinations and for health education. It carries its own water supply, has its own generator and refrigerator and is completely air-conditioned.

In a population of 25,000 people—where there is only one doctor for every 5,000 persons, one dentist for every 8,000 and where 80 percent of the children in the county suffer from worms—the Mobile Health Unit is looked forward to as a much needed blessing.

HUMAN AND RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT FACT SHEETS

Rural CAA's will find much useful information in a recent publication of the Federal Extension Service. Federal-State Programs for Developing Human and Community Resources is the title of a packet containing 49 fact sheets, each describing specific assistance available through a Government department or agency. Each fact sheet briefly states the purpose of the program, financial assistance available, how finances may be used, agency or department administering the program, where to apply and sources for further information.

The packet was prepared by Dr. Bryan Phifer, Division of Resource Development and Public Affairs, Federal Extension Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C. 20205.

Single copies are available by request to Dr. Phifer at the above address.

MISSOURI TRAINING SESSIONS UNDER WAY

The OEO-CAP sponsored training sessions for rural community action personnel at the University of Missouri are now under way. The first session which began June 5, 1966, will be completed on June 18. The next session starts July 10, and succeeding sessions will begin every second Sunday through the summer and early fall.

The curriculum has been developed in cooperation with an Advisory Committee, which includes a representative from each of the OEO Regional Offices. It includes a combination of program principles and procedures, along with a heavy emphasis on operational techniques and suggested programs for rural community action agencies.

D. Richard Wenner, Acting Director of the Rural Task Force, outlined the goals of the project in his address at the opening session: "These two-week training sessions are going to provide rural community action personnel with a great number of answers which will enable them to do a better job in serving their people. In addition, the sessions are bound to stimulate a great deal of thinking on the part of CAA personnel and are going to impart a new philosophy and a new commitment to rural community action."

The early sessions will be reserved for program directors, but there will be later sessions for other personnel. Applications for participation in the program should be made to the member of the Advisory Committee in your Regional Office: Frank Ferro, Northeast Region; Lawrence Parachini, Mid-Atlantic Region; Leo Fishman, Southeast Region; Donald Benson, Great Lakes Region; Miss Carol King, North Central Region; Christobal Aldrete, Southwest Region; Zane Meckler, Western Region.

NEWS BRIEFS FROM RURAL CAA's

From an editorial in the newsletter of the Leach Lake Reservation CAA, Cass Lake, Minn.: "Community Action is simply a way of helping people to organize, to express themselves and to make their influence felt. . . . The poor people should find a new political awareness and a commitment to involve themselves totally in the workings of their committees. When the people speak and act, and when their voices and actions have impact at home and elsewhere, that is Community Action." . . .

As a result of the Rural Opportunities story on the Family Counseling program in Washington County, Va., the director, Ruth D. Kolling, received nine requests to share the know-how of her program. Staff members of CAA's from Hercatus CAA, Ohio, Tazewell County, Va., and Giles County, Va., made trips to Washington County to observe the program operation. . . . LBJ & C Development Corporation, Monterey, Tenn., recently passed a resolution calling for "a legitimate and local allocation of [poverty] funds to rural areas" and asking "that funds thus allocated be reserved until rural centers or areas can design and perfect programs which can be funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity and not reallocated to large metropolitan centers." They also recommended "that analysts reviewing programs submitted by rural sections be instructed to give special consideration and assistance . . . instead of placing these in suspension where they die and are never resurrected." . . . Charles Mix County Community Program, Lake Andes, South Dakota has received a grant of $115,000 for a Nelson Amendment community improvement and beautification project. This is the first CAA in South Dakota to move beyond the program development stage. . . . Behind the announcement of the formation of the Indiana County Community Action Program (Pennsylvania), is the story of how the mayor, school officials, Fire Dept. employees, civic leaders, and clergy from the four townships went out and "talked" community action. Ninety people came to the first meeting. Out of a population of 3,000, of which 25 percent are low-income persons, this was a meeting that didn't "just happen." A 19-member membership committee, each member to bring at least four other persons, assured maximum attendance at the second and third CAP meetings.

RURAL PROBLEMS

Poverty On Farms Examined

U.S. Board Told Of Racial Bias

The President's Commission on Food and Fiber took a hard look at rural poverty at a hearing in Atlanta Wednesday and heard recurring themes—racial discrimination, national gearing to surpluses that are rapidly disappearing, discrimination against the South and labor supply problems.

Several witnesses testified that federal programs were administered from the beginning to benefit white farmers, often at the expense of Negro farmers.

George Esser Jr., executive director of that North Carolina Fund, a non-profit corporation created to combat poverty in North Carolina in response to a request by Gov. Terry Sanford and other leaders, asked the commission to look at rural problems in terms of rural life as a whole, rather than just farm problems.

Only one rural resident in four lives on a farm, he said, and an overall look at the gearing of training not only to farm needs, but to shifts to non-farm jobs, requires that consideration be given to whether the trainees need to be helped to move elsewhere for work. In addition, many times tenancy agreements leave trainees homeless when they enroll in classes.

He said that, while whites generally find other jobs to compensate for the dramatic decline in agricultural employement, the total number of jobs available for non-whites in the past 10 years has declined.

UNFAIRNESS ALLEGED

Billie Fleming, South Carolina NAACP official, said Negro farmers often have to sell commodities through white neighbors to get equal prices, and that all-white county committees have cut Negro allotments to give tobacco acreage allotments to whites. He said that often, when Negroes are added to local committees, they are need to be helped to move elsewhere for work. In addition, many times tenancy agreements leave trainees homeless when they enroll in classes.

He said that, while whites generally find other jobs to compensate for the dramatic decline in agricultural employement, the total number of jobs available for non-whites in the past 10 years has declined.

UNFAIRNESS ALLEGED

Billie Fleming, South Carolina NAACP official, said Negro farmers often have to sell commodities through white neighbors to get equal prices, and that all-white county committees have cut Negro allotments to give tobacco acreage allotments to whites. He said that often, when Negroes are added to local committees, they are dependent on the white community for their livelihood and cannot speak out.

Leonidas S. James, field representative for the Rural Advancement Project of the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, told the commission that Negro farmers need more assistance in diversifying. They are too dependent on crops, which are subject to more restrictions and fewer federal benefits, and are the least profitable, he said.

James said that, in one South Carolina county, Negroes can not buy land at all, and that difficulties in other areas make it hard for Negro farmers to acquire enough acreage for profitable farming.

CHARGES ADVANTAGE

F. H. Heidelberg, executive vice president of the Uplands Cotton Growers Association, charged that federal land reclamation programs provide a subsidy for Western farmers to put large areas into production of cotton, which already is in surplus supply.

He contended that this aid, which originally was limited to persons with not more than 160 acres, is extended to large corporations which own 37,000 acres or more, giving them a competitive advantage over southern rain-grown crops.

Heidelberg also asserted that, within a few months, new strains of cotton will be introduced widely by Southern state universities and experiment station, these can compete in quality with western varieties, he said.

FAMILY FARMS

Carroll Lamb, chief of the market promotion - expansion section of the Florida Department of Agriculture, said family farms are already "a thing of the past." He appealed for greater understanding of Florida's need for foreign seasonal labor.

One commissioner asked him why grower groups had not supported legislation to provide national pools of voluntary seasonal labor, with "decent wages and housing," drawing particularly on other Southern states which have high unemployment in rural areas during off-seasons.

Several witnesses Wednesday urged depth study of the "real" needs in agriculture as population catches up and exceeds surpluses.

COOPERATIVES

A cooperative can help the Community Action Program reach two useful goals:

1. Members work together to serve their communities.
2. Members increase family income by learning how to provide a new service and process or market a product. Money can be saved by group purchasing.

OEO AND COOPERATIVES

The cooperative principle is a vital tool in the Community Action Program. The Office of Economic Opportunity can fund certain costs of cooperatives for a group of people with inadequate income.

For an organizational period, a grant can be made through the local Community Action Agency to cover such costs as: legal costs of organizing the cooperative, office operation, managerial and clerical staff.

The Economic Opportunity Act and the Amendments of 1965 give the OEO Director authority to "make loans to local cooperative associations furnishing essential processing, purchasing or marketing services, supplies, or facilities predominantly to low-income rural families."

A WORK PROGRAM FOR A COOPERATIVE CAP

In applying for a CAP grant, the work program (describing the activities to be conducted under the grant), should be complete and specific. It should convey a full understanding of the proposal, and serve as a guide for subsequent work. It must also justify the budget.

Some specific questions the work program should answer are:

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Why is the cooperative being organized?

What is the community problem it will attack?

Who are the people to be served by the cooperative? How many?

Why was the cooperative format chosen?

For what purposes will the grant funds be used? How do they relate to the general program of the cooperative?

What will be the timetable of the cooperative? Indicate stages of development. When will it become self-sustaining?

How will the Community Action Agency Board and Staff be involved in the program? How will they continue to be involved?

How will the cooperative relate to and be coordinated with other components of the CAP?

How will participating individuals and families be recruited, organized? How will they be involved in policy-making?

How will the program employ low-income people?

How will the program be evaluated?

Applications for funds should be made through your local Community Action Agency.

A CAP-FUNDED COOPERATIVE

In a Southeastern county, where tobacco has been the only crop, a group of farmers, recruited through the CAP program, formed a strawberry marketing cooperative. The participating farmers obtained loans from the Office of Economic Opportunity's delegated Agency, the Farmers Home Administration, to buy equipment, fertilizer and plants, and to join the coop. The manager, a CAP employee, taught the members how to grow and market strawberries in order to increase family income.

The cooperative has applied for a loan to build and equip a processing plant.

Total CAP budget is $26,800 of which $17,600 is an OEO grant and $9200 from other sources.

A breakdown of the 10-month budget shows:

Manager	$6830
Secretary-Bookkeeper	2020
Part-time Bookkeeper	840
Social Security, etc.	995
Consultant engineer	4500
Travel (includes market development)	3240
Equipment & supplies (including packaging)	4420
Space rental	950
Other costs (including rental of demonstration plots)	3000

IN RURAL COMMUNITY ACTION

RURAL COMMUNITY ACTION PROGRAMS CAN SERVE HARD-TO-REACH OLDER PEOPLE

CAP

COMMUNITY ACTION PROGRAM
OFFICE OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20506

OLDER PEOPLE IN RURAL COMMUNITY ACTION

The rural Community Action Program can help the hard-to-reach older persons with low incomes. There is often uncommon need in this group, because of isolation and a scarcity of community services. An elderly couple, a widow or a widower, with inadequate income, may be living alone—far from neighbors. They may be so handicapped by age or disease that they are unable to take care of their household chores.

Some are homebound by illness or lack of transportation and cannot get out to buy food, clothes, and medicine. Their health is impaired because of difficulty in cooking good, nutritious, well-balanced meals. They very rarely, if ever, have callers and never go visiting. To them life holds forth no promise as it does to youth.

VISITING HOMEMAKER SERVICE

A program to send a Visiting Homemaker to older low-income persons can be developed as part of a Community Action Program. Through the services of low-income women trained as homemakers, the lives of older persons can be enriched and their health improved.

The Visiting Homemaker goes into the homes of older persons on a periodic schedule, usually three times each week. She cleans the home, does the laundry, and prepares two or three days' meals. She also buys food, drugs, and other necessities. She refers to appropriate agencies, such as the Health Department, any problems affecting the well-being of the persons she visits. She is the older person's link with the outside world.

A supervising home economist, employed by the Community Action Agency or its delegate agency, trains the Visiting Homemaker in the skills necessary to perform the service, and also supervises and schedules the visits.

Wherever feasible, older persons should be employed for the Visiting Homemaker jobs. In many cases persons over 65 are physically able to do this kind of work, and can be employed on a part-time basis. The 55-65 age group will probably furnish many good Visiting Homemakers and should have preference over younger workers.

PLANNING THE PROJECT

In planning a Visiting Homemaker Service project, a community survey should be conducted to identify eligible persons who can serve and those to be served. County Health and Welfare offices can supply some of the information. In cases where the CAA has inadequate staff to conduct the survey, low-income older persons may be employed. Where budget limitations do not permit additional employment costs, a Program Development supplementary grant may be requested from the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The survey should be designed to provide the following information:

1. Names and addresses of persons to be served.
2. Road conditions, directions, and other information pertinent to reaching the homes.
3. Whether the older person is homebound, and if so, for what reason?
4. The nature of the disability and the needs arising from it.
5. Whether the older person has transportation, and if so, what kind?
6. The condition, ownership status, sanitation, and water supply of the home of the older person.
7. Does the older person live on a farm? If so, does he own or rent? How large is the farm, and who operates it?
8. The name, sex, relationship, and birthdate of the household members.

APPLYING FOR AN OEO GRANT

An application for a grant to conduct a Visiting Homemaker Service must include a work program describing in detail the need for the program; budget justification; the number of older persons to be served and the number to be employed; program activities; number of positions and job descriptions; transportation arrangements and health examinations for Visiting Homemakers (these costs may be in cash or in kind).

In planning personnel requirements, a professional home economist can usually train 25 non-professionals and can adequately supervise 10 Visiting Homemakers. If more than 10 Homemakers are required, it may be necessary to employ an assistant supervisor.

For general budget instruction, refer to the CAP GUIDE, Vol. 1, pages 50-52.

OEO AND FOOD DISTRIBUTION

Designed to help low-income people combat problems of inadequate nutrition, the Food Distribution Program can be a Community Action component.

Food is made available without charge through the United States Department of Agriculture's Needy Family Food Distribution Program. The counties are responsible for all costs of:

Certification for eligible participants;
local transportation;
distribution;
storage.

Where the counties cannot meet all or part of the above expenditures, OEO may fund the county's share through a Community Action Agency.

Note: If a food program is to be expanded under CAP, the existing level of community contribution must be maintained.

In addition, under the Food Distribution component, employees of the CAA or delegate agency are required to teach the eligible participants improved methods of nutrition, sound consumer practices, and balanced meal planning.

The Economic Opportunity Act and the Amendments of 1965 in Title II, Section 205, give the OEO Director authority to fund "such component programs as shall be focused upon the needs of low-income individuals and families and shall provide expanded and improved services, assistance and other activities, and facilities necessary in connection therewith."

A WORK PROGRAM FOR FOOD DISTRIBUTION

In applying for a CAP grant, the work program should spell out specifically and in exact detail the activities to be funded. This description should convey a full understanding of the program, serve as a guide for program operation, and justify the budget.

Some specific questions the work program should answer:

What is the need for this program?

What community problems will it answer?

How many people will benefit from it?

Why is the county unable to support the program?

Is any part of need being met through an existing program? If so, will it be continued?

Will the County Welfare Department participate in an OEO-assisted program?

Will food be distributed without reference to race, creed, color, or national origin?

What is the timetable of program operation?

How will this program relate to other CAP components?

How will the component employ low-income people?

How will nutrition education be conducted?

How will caseworkers, nutrition aides, general employees be trained?

If a food program is presently operating, are storage and distribution space adequate for an extended CAP program?

Can county contribute space as part of non-Federal share?

Can space economies be made through staggering of distribution days? through decentralizing distribution? through use of a mobile unit for distribution?

ESSENTIAL BUDGETING FACTORS

Budgeting needs will depend, of course, on the number of people to be served. A typical program staff would include a county commodity supervisor, caseworkers and nutrition aides, a clerk-stenographer, a general employee to supervise warehouse and transport work and part-time laborers to load and distribute commodities. Other budget items will include travel, truck hire, office and warehouse rental, and supplies and equipment.

CREDIT SITUATIONS IN RURAL AREAS

Many persons in this country still pay excessive interest rates on money they borrow. There are many who cannot find credit at all and many who do not have the opportunity or habit of saving. In some parts of the nation, "loan sharks" take advantage of persons who cannot, or do not know how to, get loans from banks or other legitimate credit agencies. These are reasons that persons of "common bond" have organized and operate credit unions.

A credit union is often the best means for persons in certain locations to pool their money through savings plans—25 cents or 25 dollars, monthly or weekly.

In addition to meeting credit needs, credit unions can help low-income people learn group action. It can provide them with financial counseling and debt adjustment services.

Credit unions are chartered and supervised by both the states and the Federal Government.

Basic requirements are that the group of persons shall be of common bond—living in the same community, members of the same church, fraternal order, school system, labor union, or that they are taking part in a local anti-poverty program—and that they agree to save their money to make loans to members at low interest rates.

CAA'S CAN TAKE ACTION

The Community Action Agency (CAA) can make a credit union a CAP component. Several communities have already built credit unions into their local anti-poverty programs.

First, the CAA should determine the need through discussions with low-income people, analysis of credit problems in the area and determination of the scope and potential.

Literature should be secured (see back page) so that the CAA can arrange for early, thorough discussions with low-income people and others in the community.

OEO will not provide capital for lending but can finance staff salaries, legal expenses of incorporating, and other administrative costs, which will help the credit union through the early days as it builds volume to a self-supporting level.

ACCOMPLISHING THE JOB

Like anything else worth doing, establishing and operating a credit union requires a lot of work, patience and time.

Qualification for a charter requires identifying areas and groups, and determining their potentials for efficient operation. Finding capable persons to staff and guide the credit union is another responsibility. Staff training is essential, as is an education program for members and potential members. State Credit Union Leagues, the Bureau of Federal Credit Unions, and existing credit unions are all sources from which a CAA can find assistance in organizing a credit union. In addition, the Office of Economic Opportunity can provide consultants to assist in the planning and operation of credit union components.

These are some questions to be answered in planning:

1. What are the scope and potentials of the group to be served?
2. How widely dispersed is the target group?
3. What are the qualifications among the membership for conducting a credit union?
4. What sources of personnel are available to assist in appraising, training and evaluating effectiveness?
5. Is there adequate office space and equipment?
6. Will the board and committees have adequate representation of all target groups?
7. Will service be guaranteed for all members of the target group?
8. Is there a plan for frequent review and evaluation?

9. Has a relationship been established with the Credit Union National Association International, Inc. (CUNA) and the State Credit Union League?
10. Is there a plan for continuous training sessions with the State Credit Union League or others?

ESSENTIAL BUDGETING FACTORS

Budgeting needs depend on the possible size of membership. Staff will account for the major budget item. A full-time manager, an assistant loan counselor, and a clerk-bookkeeper will probably be necessary. Other budget items will include travel, office space, materials and supplies, equipment, etc. In some localities, certain items might be donated.

FAMILY COUNSELING

IN RURAL COMMUNITY ACTION

A FAMILY COUNSELING PROGRAM CAN ASSIST LOW-INCOME FAMILIES TO

- STRENGTHEN HOME LIFE
- KNOW SOURCES OF HELP
- SOLVE PROBLEMS

CAP

COMMUNITY ACTION PROGRAM
OFFICE OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20506

FAMILY COUNSELING attacks the problems of social and geographic isolation of poor rural families. It seeks to strengthen the initiative of the family in solving its own problems and brings together the family and the resources needed for that purpose.

Family Counseling works in a way that will add to the self-respect and self-direction of the participants and will improve relations within the family and with the community. A Family Counseling program can be a rural CAP component.

JOB OF THE COUNSELOR

The Family Counselor is the link between the CAA and the individuals or families in need of assistance. The Counselor, who is a nonprofessional employed by the CAA:

- Establishes communication with the family
- Helps them identify their problems
- Develops individual incentive
- Brings together the family and sources of help
- Follows family progress toward solution of its problems

As the family identifies its problems, the Family Counselor refers it to those agencies—local, State or Federal—which can help to meet the need for:

- Referral for job training and employment
- Health services
- Food and clothing management
- Home improvement
- Financial management
- Education
- Housing
- Legal aid
- Consumer education
- Family relations
- Community improvement
- Neighborhood cooperation

OEO AND FAMILY COUNSELING

Reaching into the remote and secluded areas where rural low-income families reside is a vital part of the Community Action Program and the Family Counseling component can be the practical means of achieving it.

The Economic Opportunity Act and the Amendments of 1965 in Title II, Section 205, provide that "Such component programs shall be focused upon the needs of low-income individuals and families and shall provide expanded and improved services, assistance and other activities, and facilities necessary in connection therewith."

STAFFING THE PROGRAM

A professional social worker should be in charge of the Family Counseling CAP component. He will plan and conduct the program, and select, train, and supervise the staff.

In choosing Family Counselors from the low-income applicants, he should consider their personal qualities, leadership ability, adaptability, and commitment to the purposes of the program. In addition, they should be persons who will continue to identify with the low-income families after being employed by the CAA.

Counselor orientation and training, possibly a two-week session, should include:

The philosophy of Economic Opportunity Programs and how it applies to rural areas.

The resources, both public and private, available to help solve family problems.

The techniques of counseling, interviewing, record-keeping, conducting meetings, identifying problems, developing interest and incentive in family members.

A Family Counselor can be expected to work effectively with approximately 30 to 40 families, depending on geographic factors. Counselors should have periodic or continuing in-service training.

WRITING THE WORK PROGRAM

As part of an application for a Family Counseling component, the work program must describe in detail the scope and activities planned, and should justify each budget item. It should be complete enough to serve as a guide for the operation of the program.

Some specific questions the work program should answer:

How will this program improve the conditions of low-income families?

How many families might require such services?

How will families be located and their needs identified?

How will the program employ low-income people?

What criteria will be used in selecting employees?

What training program has been planned?

What are the qualifications and functions of supervisors?

What will be the timetable of the program?

How will the program be coordinated with other CAP components such as Homemaking?

How will other community agencies be utilized as resources in this program?

How will the component be evaluated?

REMEDIAL READING

IN RURAL COMMUNITY ACTION

ES

A REMEDIAL READING PROGRAM FOR THE RURAL CHILD CAN BE A VITAL FORCE IN EDUCATION IMPROVEMENT

CAP

COMMUNITY ACTION PROGRAM
OFFICE OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20506

REMEDIAL READING

A remedial reading program is often a serious need in rural areas where teaching facilities and skills lag behind those in the cities. The average rural citizen has 1.4 years less education than his city cousin. Poor reading ability among youth is a major factor in the dropout problem and unemployment. A Remedial Reading component in the Community Action Program can help young people overcome reading handicaps.

OEO AND REMEDIAL READING

The Office of Economic Opportunity and the U.S. Office of Education make funds available for remedial reading programs.

In order to budget wisely and conduct an effective program, it is important that your Community Action Agency work closely with the private and public schools in your area.

In a remedial reading program:

- establish a close relationship between classroom teachers and remedial reading specialists;
- provide for teacher education and training;
- consider means to coordinate testing and diagnosis, identify deficiencies;
- set up health, guidance and counseling services to identify physical or psychological handicaps for referral;
- utilize the technical assistance of available college or university remedial reading specialists.

CLASS CRITERIA

Remedial reading class time and place will depend on your school system. Classes may be held during spare time in the regular school day, or after school hours, or on Saturdays.

Note: Methods should not conflict with those of the normal reading program though the use of similar material is preferable.

While class size should normally range from 10 to 15 students, as few as five can justify a class.

STAFF REQUIREMENTS

A good balance in teacher qualifications is important. The normal requirement for a remedial reading instructor is a Bachelor's degree in education with courses in teaching reading, plus one year's teaching experience. However, lower qualifications can be offset somewhat by frequent staff meetings (once or twice per week) in which problems of techniques are discussed and analyzed. The project director, who must have a degree in education, will coordinate these staff sessions.

Nonprofessionals used as teacher assistants must have thorough preparation, including pre-service, in-service, and other related training courses. For secondary teaching level, methods of tutoring and techniques of motivation, diagnosis, and individual instruction are required.

THE PROGRAM

The focus of the remedial reading program should be on the particular grade level in the schools where the incidence of reading retardation begins. Early identification of reading retardation is essential for effective rehabilitation. Serious retardation should have priority of attention.

The program should be motivational as well as remedial, with the instructor stimulating interest so that the students consider reading a tool for thought and enjoyment as well as a means to employment. Parents' involvement is helpful and home visits can contribute toward greater parent participation. This can be done by the trained nonprofessional.

Some Basic Guidelines

1. Remedial reading instruction should be given only after a thorough diagnostic testing. Standardized tests are the best available means of determining reading ability and the type of problems involved.
2. Testing is never final. It should be continuous and subject to revision.
3. The whole child must be considered. Therefore, the diagnostic program should include a review of all the causative factors.
4. Adequate classroom space and facilities should be mandatory.

5. Qualified personnel are necessary for a good program. A good remedial reading teacher must have been, first, a good classroom teacher of reading.
6. A school reading clinic should be held to provide practical training for teachers in the school.

A CAP-FUNDED PROGRAM

In a West Virginia county where more than 90 percent of the population is disadvantaged, 600 students in grades 1 through 3 are participating in a Remedial Reading program at selected schools in the local county school system. All 600 were tested to determine their grade levels and performance capabilities. At regular intervals, they are retested to show the degree of progress.

The program employs 10 specialized Remedial Reading teachers, each of whom has had training at West Virginia University.

The students have shown marked progress in reading, pronunciation, vocabulary, and discipline. The use of special typewriters, phonic and reading workbooks, and an interest-stimulating method keeps the attention of even the first graders.

BUDGETING

Typical program expense will range between $100 and $200 per pupil per school year. In addition to salaries for personnel, the budget should include the services of a consultant, expenditures for classroom space where necessary, travel, and miscellaneous items.

RURAL PROBLEMS

What you should know about

FARMER COOPERATIVES

A cooperative is a business owned and operated by the people who use the goods and services it supplies. It is one way that people can pool cash and some of their other resources to work together for a better life for each of them.

Most successful farm operators depend upon cooperatives. They may get their electricity through their local rural electric cooperatives, and their seed, fertilizer, feed, and other supplies through purchasing co-ops; sell the products they grow through marketing co-ops; and borrow the money they need to carry on their operations through cooperative Land Banks, production credit associations, and credit unions. Even the smallest farmer -- and the farm worker, too -- may find that cooperatives can help him save money in his farming and in supplying his family's needs.

An Example of a Need - Credit Unions

One of the easiest ways to save money is not to borrow it from the landlord, the supply merchant, the ginner, the loan shark. Yet almost all farmers and sharecroppers must borrow during the growing season, and farmworkers often must borrow during the off season. A study showed that Negro small farmers in St. Landry Parish, Louisiana, were really paying their landlords 11.7% and their supply merchants 14.8% interest (even though it was reported at a lower rate). Those who could borrow from a production credit association or from a bank paid 6% to 6.8% interest (with no extra hidden charges). Most of the loans were from $50 up to $500.

A credit union is one kind of cooperative. It could have lent this money cheaper and might have worked out a better schedule for repayment. It might have been able to help those that the production credit association and the banks would not help, including farmworkers and non-farmers.

How a cooperative operates

A cooperative is organized to save money for its member-users and to bring them needed services, not to make a profit for stockholders. All cooperatives operate on this basic principle.

1. Open membership. Anyone can join a cooperative who can use and pay for its services, and pay the membership fee. (You have to be a farmer to belong to a farmer co-op. The membership fee depends upon the kind of business, usually ranging from $5.00 to $100.00.)

2. Democratic control. The cooperative is controlled by the members and every member in good standing can vote. Each member usually has one vote no matter how much stock he owns.

3. Limited interest on capital invested. Members buy shares in the cooperative so that it will have enough money to operate, but it is set up to serve its members, not to make a profit, so the members limit the amount of interest they pay themselves on their invested capital.

4. Service at as near to cost as possible. After cooperatives have paid their operating expenses, they may pay dividends to members on their invested capital. The net savings left over is allocated and paid to the patrons as patronage refunds. This means that it is divided up on the basis of goods bought or services used during the year. The more you use your co-op the larger refund you will get.

Types of cooperatives

There are almost as many kinds of cooperatives as there are needs for goods and services. Here are a few that have been most useful for rural people:

Purchasing co-ops - to buy at wholesale and to sell to their members such products as seed, fertilizers, machinery, gasoline, home appliances, and groceries.

Marketing co-ops - to gin, pack or prepare their members' products for market; and to sell them locally or ship them to market.

Credit unions - to encourage thrift and savings and to lend money to their members at reasonable rates. Usually, all members must belong to the same organization, such as a church or civic group.

Other Service co-ops - to own and operate expensive machinery; to develop water, forestry, and conservation districts; to build and operate housing for older persons, and health clinics; to reduce insurance and funeral costs.

How to use a cooperative -- or start a new one

First, visit the cooperative nearest you. Get its literature on how it operates and how to join. If it can meet some of your needs, join it, take part in its meetings, vote in its elections, and use its services. If there is no co-op nearby, try to get the one that best meets your needs to open a branch in your area.

Many co-ops have failed. Before starting one, learn if a cooperative will meet your local needs and if you have the resources to make it successful. Experts on cooperatives can help you determine if a proposed cooperative is practicable and has a chance for success.

Some of the causes of co-op failure have been: (1) Not enough persons in the area had enough need for it; (2) The members did not understand how cooperatives really operate; (3) There was no convenient source of supply for a purchasing co-op or a reasonable market for the products of a marketing one; (4) The manager was not qualified to run the business; (5) The members could not raise enough capital (although loans may have been available if the plans were really feasible).

No matter how big some cooperatives now are, most of them started with just a few persons sitting down and planning together how to get the things and services they need cheaper and better. But expert help is needed; get it from the start.

How to get help

What you should know about

FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION LOANS

If you are a farmer and need additional funds at reasonable terms and rates to consolidate debts, for operating expenses, to improve your crop, stock, house, or buildings, or to buy a farm or equipment, Farmers Home Administration may be able to help you. You may have been turned down for an FHA loan in the past--or have been told that it is useless for you to apply. But if your farm experience makes you believe that with enough credit you can manage a farm successfully as either an owner or a tenant, you should apply again. Be sure to apply in writing, as only written applications can be considered.

Floyd F. Higbee, FHA Deputy Administrator, instructed all FHA offices:

"We must concentrate on helping farmers improve their conditions... rather than to use their problems and shortcomings as a basis for rejecting their applications for assistance....The best efforts of this agency are now directed specifically to assisting family farmers through loans and guidance to the end that no deserving family farmer will have to give up the struggle of remaining on the farm because of factors that have come about through reasons beyond his control." (FHA Bulletin No. 691, February 15, 1961.)

Kinds of loans available

If you think any of the FHA loans listed here might help you, ask your FHA county office for the special leaflets that will tell you much more about them.

Operating loans: To help make your farm and home operations successful. Loans for livestock, feed, fertilizer, and farm equipment; for food, clothing, medical care, and other household expenses; to refinance debts; to produce trees, and to do other things to make your farm more productive. Terms: Loans up to seven years at 5% interest; 3% interest for forestry operations.

Farm Ownership loans: To buy, enlarge, and improve family farms. Loans for farm homes and buildings, to drill wells, to develop and improve forest or recreational enterprises. They are for larger, longer-range projects than operating loans. Terms: Loans up to 40 years at 5% interest; 3% interest for forestry.

Rural Housing loans: To build or improve farm homes or buildings, or non-farm homes in rural areas or communities of less than 2500. Loans to install heating or water, or to modernize; or to buy a house or homesite for persons over 62 years. Terms: Loans up to 33 years at 4% interest. Owners unable to repay a loan may be able to get a grant of up to $1000 for minor safety or health improvements.

Water Development and Soil Conservation loans: To improve your water supply and your land; for wells, farmstead water, irrigation and drainage, grading, fertilizing and seeding; to develop permanent pastures and improve forestry practices; to join a water district; and to pay for engineering plans and legal fees. Terms: Loans up to 40 years at 5% interest; 3% for forestry.

Emergency loans: To help farmers who need special credit to carry on their normal operations because of widespread losses caused by floods, droughts, and other natural disasters. They are usually made only in areas specially designated by the Secretary of Agriculture but sometimes can be made when only one or a few farmers are affected. Terms: Loans up to 7 years for livestock and equipment, up to 20 years for buildings and land improvement, at 3% interest.

Loans to groups: These are available for watershed improvement, water systems, irrigation, soil conservation, the development of grasslands, and forestry and recreational enterprises, and for the building of housing for older persons. Ask the FHA county office for information about these programs.

Who is eligible for FHA loans

The special requirements for the different types of loans are given in the FHA leaflets. All of the loans (except for rural housing) require the following:

1. that you are unable to get credit for the loan you need at reasonable rates and terms from private or cooperative lending agencies;

2. that you have a farm background and the farm experience or training necessary to be successful in carrying out the planned farm operation;

3. that you work out a plan with the FHA county supervisor that will make it possible to carry through the operation and pay off the loan;

4. that after the loan is made you actually will be managing or operating a farm either as owner, or tenant under a written lease, and that you be of legal age (and, in some cases, a U.S. citizen);

5. that you have the character, industry, and ability to carry out the farming operation for which you obtain the loan.

How to apply -- Who determines whether or not you are eligible

Consider your own farm operation very carefully. If you think that with a loan you can increase your cash income enough to both live better and pay off the loan, ask the FHA county supervisor to help you plan your operations and help you prepare your application. Your application will be reviewed by the FHA county committee which will decide whether or not you get the loan. The FHA committee is made up of three local farmers appointed by the FHA state director. The committee may ask you and your family to meet with it. Try to have other farmers who know you tell the committee about your background and ability. The local committee should decide in about two weeks. Appeals may be taken to the state director. Even if you don't qualify for an FHA loan at this time, the FHA office can help you plan for farm improvements.

What to do if you think you are not being treated fairly on an FHA loan

You have the right to have the FHA county office help you review your farm operations and plan your improvements. You are entitled to be treated with courtesy at the FHA county office and to receive help in preparing your loan application. If other debts are keeping you from qualifying, the FHA office may be able to help you try to work out new arrangements with your other creditors. The FHA county committee must consider your application fairly regardless of your color, the smallness of your farm, or any bad credit or operating experiences in the past.

Keep a careful written record of all your contacts with the FHA office and a copy of your applications. Keep every letter or notice that is sent to you, and keep the envelope it came in. If you think that you are not being treated fairly, write a letter telling everything that happened to: The Administrator, Farmers Home Administration, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. 20250.

What you should know about

SURPLUS FOOD PROGRAMS

(Direct distribution, Food Stamp, and School Lunch Programs)

What they are

"Surplus food" is some of the food the farmer grows but cannot sell at the price he wants to get for it. It is available for distribution to people who need it but cannot buy it because they are out of work, unable to work, or paid too little when they are working to carry them over the off-season, or because disaster strikes.

The Department of Agriculture buys or takes over this food under price support and other governmental programs and, through the Agricultural Marketing Service, gives it to state and local welfare agencies and to schools. The federal government usually does not distribute this food directly to the persons who need it, and the Department of Agriculture does not have the money or the staff to do this except on an emergency basis.

How the food is distributed

1. Direct distribution through local public welfare agencies. The Agricultural Marketing Service packages the food and delivers it without charge to central distribution points within a cooperating state. Local public welfare officials decide whether or not they want to participate, to what extent, and for what period of the year. As they pay the cost of collecting the food from the central depots in the state and of distributing it to the persons entitled to it (sometimes with help from the state), there is no way legally to force a local community to take part in the program--or continue in it--if it does not want to do so. Occasionally, a local community has permitted a private welfare agency to assume the responsibility for (and the costs of) local distribution, but the public officials still must supervise the program with the help of AMS workers.

If a local community does take part in the direct food distribution program, it must follow the standards set by the federal government. It can distribute the food only to those in need, and it determines what families are in need. However, it cannot apply different tests to different families. It cannot deny food to persons because of their color or punish them by withdrawing food because of their civil rights or other political activities.

If your community is not taking part in the program or if it ends the program altogether at the end of the off-season, only negotiation or public pressure can bring it to take part or continue in the program. Sometimes local civic and religious groups can be persuaded to intervene. Sometimes a private welfare agency will take up the burden with the consent of the local officials. Sometimes state officials or the Department of Agriculture will intercede.

2. The Food Stamp Program. This program permits low-income families and families on welfare to spend their food money to buy food stamps of higher value. The family can then use the stamps to purchase food at any grocery. If your community has need for this program, rally local backing and write to the Secretary of Agriculture urging that your community be included in the Food Stamp Program.

3. National School Lunch Program. Any public or nonprofit private school can take part in this program if it operates its lunch program on a nonprofit basis, serves lunches free or at a reduced cost to those who cannot pay the full price, and serves lunches that meet the Department of Agriculture's nutritional standards. The federal government will pay $1 out of every $4 paid for some of the food bought locally for the lunch program and will contribute most of the rest of the food needed. Any group, such as a parent-teacher association, church, or fraternal or other service club, can help the local school start and carry on the program.

If your local school does not have a school lunch program, find out why from the school board. Interest local individuals and groups in helping to get a program launched. Seek help from the state Department of Education, which supervises the program in each state.

4. Special Milk Program. Even if a school does not take part in the school lunch program, it can still get federal assistance to serve milk free or at a reduced cost. This aid is also available for camps, orphanages, and other child care institutions. For information, write to Agricultural Marketing Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C. 20250.

5. Disaster Relief. Substantial supplies of federally donated food are almost always quickly available to whole communities when such disasters as hurricanes, floods, drought, and widespread fire strike. But disasters sometimes strike single families too, and the same relief is often available if quickly sought. Check in time of need with local welfare officials and the local chapter of the American Red Cross.

If you find that any federally assisted food program is not being administered fairly and you cannot work it out with local and state officials, gather your facts carefully and send a full account of them to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D.C. 20250.

What you should know about

ACREAGE ALLOTMENT PROGRAMS
(for cotton, peanuts, and rice)

This fact sheet furnishes general information on farm acreage allotments and marketing quotas for cotton, peanuts, and rice. If you have any questions about these acreage allotments and marketing quota programs, you should discuss them with the local County Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service Office.

Marketing Quota Referendums and Acreage Allotments

Marketing quota referendums for cotton and peanuts are held by county ASC committees each year in which the Secretary proclaims a national marketing quota for these crops. The referendums are held not later than December 15 and must be approved by at least two-thirds of the farmers voting. Any farm owner, tenant, or sharecropper who "engaged in the production" of these crops in the year the referendum is held can vote.

With respect to rice, a referendum must be held within 30 days after the Secretary proclaims a national marketing quota. When conditions require it the national marketing quota for rice must be proclaimed by the Secretary between July 1 and December 1. Rice quotas must also be approved by at least two-thirds of the farmers voting. To be eligible to vote a farmer must have "engaged in the production" of rice during the year in which the referendum is held. Notices of acreage allotments are issued in advance of referendums in order that farmers will know the effect of the program on their farms.

How big an acreage allotment should you get?

The acreage allotted to you should be your fair share of the acreage allotted to your county for the crop. Generally, your fair share is based upon the past crop history of your farm and of the other farms producing the crop. (Abnormal growing conditions, the land, crop rotation, and your own experience are sometimes considered.) The allotments for all the farms in your county are listed at the ASC county office. Examine this list right away if you do not think your allotment is fair. Even if you have a small farm or a new farm you are usually entitled to some allotment for the crop. Ask the ASC office or your county agent to explain your allotment to you. A producer growing an allotment crop without an allotment is subject to marketing quota penalties and does not qualify for an allotment for subsequent years. Therefore, before a farmer without an allotment grows one of these crops he should discuss his chances for a "new farm" allotment with his county ASC committee.

ASCS County Elections

Once each year local farmers elect community committees whose chairmen elect the county ASC committee. Generally any farmer who is eligible to participate in one of the ASCS price support programs, has an acreage allotment established for his farm or participates in the Agricultural Conservation, Conservation Reserve, or Feed Grain Program, is eligible to vote in ASCS committee elections. These elections are well publicized locally. Any farmer who has any questions as to eligibility to vote should contact the local county ASCS office prior to the date of the election.

What to do if you don't get your notice of acreage allotment or think your allotment is unfair

If you do not get a notice of your allotment in the mail at the same time that your neighbors get theirs and before the marketing quota referendum, inquire at once at your local ASC office and write a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington 25, D. C., telling him what happened.

When you get a notice of your allotment in the mail, read it carefully right away and save it. If you don't understand it, ask your local ASCS office to explain it to you. If you are not satisfied that the allotment is right for your farm, file a written application for review with your local ASCS office within fifteen days from the date of the postmark on your notice. Keep your copy of your notice of allotment. If you need help in filing an application for review of your allotment, the ASCS office will help you with it.

If you apply for a review of your allotment in time, it will be reviewed by an ASC review committee of three farmers who have been appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture and who are different from your local ASC committee. This committee will change your allotment if it decides, after considering all aspects of your case, that you did not get a fair share of the crop acreage allotted to your county.

If you still do not think that you are being treated fairly after the review committee has made its findings, you can appeal to the United States District Court or to the State Court of your county for further review. This is likely to be expensive, however, and you should get legal advice before you try to do this.

How to get an extra allotment

If you want to put more acres in the crop than you were first allotted, apply to the ASC committee. The county committee has held in reserve part of the allotted land to take care of the adjustment of any claims made, and sometimes growers do not want to plant all the acreage given them. This excess is divided among all those who apply for it.

The measurement of your land

The correct measurement of your land is important to you and to the government. If your fields are measured too big, you will not be planting all the acres to which you are entitled. If they are measured too small, you may be planting more than you were allotted and have to plow up some of it or be subject to other penalties. If you request it, the ASC committee must measure your fields before you plant them or will remeasure them later. But you must pay for the cost of this special measurement, so be sure you find out how much it is going to cost you before you ask the committee to do it. If you don't ask for prior measurement or remeasurement, you are bound by the ASC committee's determination of your acreage.

- - - - - - - - - - -

If your ASC committee office does not treat you with fairness and with courtesy, or if it segregates you or discriminates against you in any other way, get all the facts you can, including what happened and when and where it happened. Get the names of the persons involved and of witnesses if you can. Send a full report of it to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington 25, D. C.

The Independent Schools Talent Search Program

The United States
& Japan

PURPOSE

The Independent Schools Talent Search Program seeks promising students from disadvantaged circumstances and places them in independent boarding schools under major scholarship grants for the final two to four years of their high school education. The aim of the Program is to prepare these students for eventual entrance into college.

BACKGROUND

On February 23, 1963 representatives of twenty-one independent schools convened to consider ways and means of helping promising students who, because of a lack of resources and educational and cultural advantages, are unable to realize their apparent ability. It was felt that at least two years at an independent school could assist materially in preparing these students for successful college entrance. As a result of this meeting, the Independent Schools Talent Search Program was founded.

In the summer of 1964, Dartmouth College held the first ABC (A Better Chance) Project - an eight week summer residential experience to prepare some of the boys accepted through ISTSP for the difficult curriculum and for the different way of life at boarding school. In the summer of 1965, Dartmouth's program was complemented by a similar ABC Project for girls at Mount Holyoke College. In the summer of 1966, three new ABC Programs - at Carleton College, Williams College and Duke University - were established to provide space for 370 summer scholars.

The initial group of twenty ISTSP member independent schools has grown steadily and now numbers over one hundred.

THE SCHOOLS

It would be unfortunate to explain the member schools of ISTSP as one group. There is a healthy diversity of character, method and goal among them.

The opportunities available to the student at an independent school are almost unlimited. Substantial operating funds make possible a small pupil-teacher ratio, give the student the opportunity of close attention from instructors, provide him with excellent classrooms, library and laboratory facilities, and place him with classmates who will stimulate and challenge his abilities. Most of the schools have a broad program of physical education and extracurricular activities, complementing his work in the classroom. This cultivation of academic ability, extracurricular interest and character is a fine preparation for college and for life.

THE STUDENTS

It is often difficult to identify the kind of students ISTSP is seeking because students from disadvantaged circumstances encounter frustrating obstacles in their advance toward a college education.

A "typical" ISTSP applicant is achieving at least adequately in his present school. He generally has a strong concept of himself and a desire to improve his situation. However, there is a lack of awareness of the opportunities now available to all students regardless of background and financial resources and a natural hesitancy to take advantage of the opportunities that do exist. Often the damaging effects of poverty have already begun to make the possibilities for higher education seem distressingly remote. Despite their high level of motivation it will be difficult if not impossible for many of our students to complete high school.

An ISTSP student needs special personal qualities as well as strong academic promise. He should possess an inner "toughness", a resiliency and resourcefulness, which will enable him to make the difficult transition to preparatory school.

Colleges and universities have long recognized the special strengths of this kind of student and have done much to identify these young people and offer the necessary financial aid to make it possible for them to enroll. Indeed, scholarship funds from private sources, together with federal resources recently made available through the Higher Education Act improves the chances of a college education for all who qualify academically. The difficulty is to find students whose secondary school preparation will enable them to compete successfully in college. With a few years of preparation in an independent school, a student will find that the door to college lies truly open.

ASSOCIATED ABC PROJECTS

The schools which founded ISTSP recognized that many of the students who could gain admission to an independent school might, in spite of their ability and motivation, be totally unprepared for the greater demands of life at boarding school. The ABC Project attempts to help the students in their transition to boarding school and to determine which students, if any, are not ready to go on to independent school.

The ABC curriculum consists of intensive work in English and mathematics - how to read, write and speak more effectively, and how to master basic concepts in arithmetic and algebra. The Program also stresses reading and study skills, experience in writing examinations and the use of the library. Students work with faculty and undergraduate resident-tutors in small classes and tutorials. College athletic facilities, cultural activities and field trips are provided to enrich the summer experience.

Each ABC staff includes experienced public and private secondary schools teachers and carefully selected undergraduate resident-tutors from the ABC College. Students live in college dormitories - in small groups, each group with a resident-tutor. Meals are served in college dining halls.

Students cannot apply to the ABC Project only. Admission to a Summer Program is granted only to students who have been accepted into a member school of the Independent Schools Talent Search Program. Appropiate forms may be obtained directly from ISTSP, not from the ABC Colleges.

THE ISTSP APPLICATION

Application should be made by students who will enter the ninth and tenth grades in the fall of 1967. Students applying for the eighth and eleventh grades will be at a disadvantage because ISTSP schools have few places in these grades. Because there are many more boys' schools than girls' schools there are more places for boys than for girls. Many students applying to ISTSP take an "extra year". A student, for instance, who would normally be entering the eleventh grade in public school may be asked to enter independent school at the tenth grade level, taking extra work in the subject areas in which he is weakest and going ahead in areas in which he has special strengths or ability.

The application for ISTSP has five parts: the Parents Report, the School Record, the Student's Statement and two Letters of Recommendation. These forms can be obtained by writing the Independent Schools Talent Search Program, 376 Boylston Street, Boston, Massachussetts.

In addition, all candidates are expected to take Secondary Schools Admissions Tests (SSAT). An information booklet and application to take the test will be included with each ISTSP application. The test is given at examination centers throughout the country and is given three times a year - in December, February and April. Applicants taking the December test will have a definite advantage. Some ISTSP students will be selected from among those taking the February test. Candidates should not plan to take the April test.

When candidates take the SSAT examination they will be asked to indicate the code number of the schools to which the results should be sent. Instead of indicating schools, ISTSP applicants should write in "573-ISTSP". Failure to specify "573-ISTSP" will result in a delay which will in turn affect the applicant's chances of acceptance.

Applications to ISTSP should be completed by January 1, 1967.

THE COST

The normal annual cost of room, board and tuition in the participating independent schools is approximately $2,500, not including expenditures for travel, clothes, laundry, recreation, and so on. The schools have agreed to give the students whom they accept full financial aid for room, board and tuition and to assist with the other costs when this is necessary. On the Parent's Report form of the application, the student's family is asked to state how much financial support can reasonably be provided. It is assumed that the family will want to contribute something, since this would be evidence of the family's desire to support the student in his effort to attend an independent school.

The fee for Secondary School Admissions Test is $7.

If a student is accepted into the Program there is a $15. fee to attend the ABC Program.

The lack of financial resources should not discourage any student from making application to ISTSP.

A CALENDAR FOR APPLICATION

SEPTEMBER THROUGH NOVEMBER: Secure application forms, fill them out completely and return them to the ISTSP office. Make sure the applicant's school returns the School Report to ISTSP within a reasonable period of time.

Before the November deadline, apply for admission to one of the Educational Testing Service examination centers to take the December Secondary Schools Admissions Test. Fill out the post card which was included with your ISTSP application forms stating the examination center number and the date you expect to take the examination and return it to ISTSP.

DECEMBER: After you have made application to take the Secondary Schools Admissions Test you will receive a ticket of admission to the test center to which you have been assigned. Take the December Secondary Schools Admissions Test at your assigned examination center. Be sure to put down the "573-ISTSP" code at the time you take the test. Failure to do this will mean a delay in the report of test results to ISTSP and may affect an applicant's chances of being accepted into the Program. Do not indicate any of the individual schools, since ISTSP will send the results to the schools to which applications are referred.

JANUARY: Each completed application will be read by members of the ISTSP staff who will select a number of schools which seem suitable to the applicant's interests and abilities.

FEBRUARY THROUGH APRIL: Applications will be referred by ISTSP to member independent schools for their consideration. If a school decides to accept a candidate, the school will write directly to the candidate's family. A student's acceptance will become final after he successfully completes the summer ABC Program. An application may be considered by as many as six or seven schools during the referral period.

MAY: When all the available places have been filled, ISTSP will assign those students who have been granted contingent acceptances by an ISTSP member school to ABC Summer Programs. Applicants for whom ISTSP has been unable to find places will also be notified.

CIVIL RIGHTS DIGEST

PUBLISHED BY THE U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

1701 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE, N.W.. WASHINGTON, D.C. 20425

SPECIAL BULLETIN—AUGUST 1964

A SUMMARY OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

This summary of the 1964 Civil Rights Act was prepared in response to questions about the Act which have come to the Commission from citizens in every section of the country. It is designed to provide a clearer understanding of the major provisions of the new statute.

Some of the questions raised about any new law cannot be fully answered until the policies and programs necessary for carrying out the law have been developed by the appropriate Government agencies. Other questions will be further clarified as the courts deal with cases brought under the law.

This summary was prepared by the staff of the Commission and is available for distribution as a service under the national clearinghouse function assigned the Commission by the new Civil Rights Act.

Title I

VOTING

The purpose of this section is to provide more effective enforcement of the right to vote in Federal elections (for President, Vice President, presidential electors or members of Congress) without regard to race or color. It also speeds up the procedure by which voting rights suits may be decided.

The Act:

a. requires that the same standards be applied to all individuals seeking to register and vote;

b. forbids denial of the right to vote because of some minor mistake or omission;

c. requires that only literacy tests that are written may be used as a qualification for voting; and that the tests and answers be available on request;

d. establishes that in voting rights law suits the court must presume that anyone who completed the sixth grade is literate, unless the State can prove otherwise.

In any voting suit brought by the Government charging that there is a "pattern or practice" of voting discrimination, either the Attorney General or the defendant may ask that a three-judge Federal court be appointed to hear the case. Appeals from the decisions of such a court may be taken directly to the Supreme Court.

Title II

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin is specifically forbidden in the following places of public accommodation:

a. hotels and motels, restaurants, lunch counters, movie houses, gasoline stations, theaters and stadiums;

b. any other establishment which offers its services to patrons of the covered establishment; for example,

–a barbershop or tavern located in a hotel, or –a department store in which there is a restaurant: so long as the covered facilities either affect interstate commerce in their operations, or are supported in their discriminatory practices by State action.

In addition, discrimination is forbidden in any other place of public accommodation that is required to segregate by State or local laws.

If there are no State or local laws requiring segregation, the Federal law does not cover:

a. barbershops, beauty parlors and other service establishments unless they are located in a hotel and offer these services to hotel guests;

b. retail stores that do not serve food, or places of recreation (except as listed above) which do not serve food;

c. lodging houses, hotels or similar places which take temporary guests if they have fewer than six rooms for rent in a building occupied by the owner.

Places that are actually owned and operated as private clubs are exempted from coverage of this title except to the extent that they offer their facilities to patrons of a covered establishment, such as a country club that customarily allows guests of a hotel to use its golf course.

No person may intimidate, threaten or coerce anyone for the purpose of interfering with the rights created by this title.

The provisions of this title may be enforced in two ways:

1. By individual action in a civil suit filed by the persons discriminated against, or

2. By Government action in a civil suit filed by the Attorney General.

In public accommodations suits filed by individuals:

—the court hearing the suit may appoint a lawyer for the person bringing the complaint and exempt the complainant from the payment of certain costs;

—the court may permit the Attorney General to enter the case;

—if there is a State law or local ordinance that prohibits discrimination, the complaint must first be taken to the State or local authorities, allowing them 30 days to begin a proceeding before suit can be filed in a Federal court;

—once the case is in court, the court can postpone action until the State or local proceeding is completed;

—if there are no State or local anti-discrimination provisions, the court may refer the matter to the Community Relations Service (see Title X) so that it may seek to secure voluntary compliance within no more than 120 days.

The Attorney General may file a public accommodations suit when he believes there is a pattern or practice of resistance. As in Title I voting suits, he may request a three-judge court for this action.

In public accommodations suits brought either by individuals or the Attorney General, the court may issue temporary or permanent injunctions or restraining orders against those found to be violating the law. A person or persons failing to obey such court decrees may be punished by contempt proceedings under the jury trials provision of the law (see Title XI).

Title III

PUBLIC FACILITIES

The Attorney General is authorized to bring a civil suit to compel desegregation of any publicly-owned or operated facility whenever he receives a written complaint of discrimination. He must believe that the complaint merits action and must certify that the individual or individuals making the complaint are themselves unable to take the necessary legal action. State or municipally owned or operated parks, libraries and hospitals are among the facilities covered.

Title IV

PUBLIC EDUCATION

Under this title the U.S. Office of Education is authorized to:

a. conduct a national survey to determine the availability of equal educational opportunity;

b. provide technical assistance, upon request, to help States, political subdivisions or school districts carry out school desegregation plans;

c. arrange training institutes to prepare teachers and other school personnel to deal with desegregation problems;

d. make grants enabling school boards to employ specialists for in-service training programs.

In addition, the Attorney General is authorized to file civil suits seeking to compel desegregation of public schools, including public colleges.

Before filing such a suit the Attorney General must have received a signed complaint from a pupil or parent and must have determined that the complainant, according to standards set forth in the Act, is unable to bring the action. The Attorney General is also required to notify the school board and give it a reasonable period of time to correct the alleged condition before filing suit.

Title V

COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

The life of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is extended until January 31, 1968. Since 1957 the Commission's functions have included investigating denials of the right to vote, studying legal developments and appraising Federal policies relating to equal protection of the laws, and making recommendations for corrective action to the President and the Congress.

Title V gives the Commission added authority to:

a. serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information;

b. investigate allegations of vote fraud.

Commission hearing procedures are amended to further protect the rights of individuals who may be affected by Commission proceedings.

As a national clearinghouse, the Commission will provide civil rights information in such areas as voting, housing, education, employment and the use of public facilities to Federal, State and local government agencies and officials, organizations and businesses, and the general public.

Title VI

FEDERALLY ASSISTED PROGRAMS

Under this title every Federal agency which provides financial assistance through grants, loans or contracts is required to eliminate discrimination on the grounds of race, color or national origin in these programs.

For example, this title would require the following:

a. hospitals constructed with Federal funds would have to serve all patients without regard to race, color or national origin;

b. elementary and secondary schools constructed, maintained and operated with Federal funds would have to admit children without regard to race, color or national origin;

c. State employment services financed by Federal funds would have to refer qualified job applicants for employment without discrimination;

d. schools for the deaf and the blind operated with Federal funds would have to serve the deaf and blind of any color;

e. colleges and universities receiving funds for their general operation or for the construction of special facilities, such as research centers, would have to admit students without discrimination;

f. construction contractors receiving funds under Federal public works programs would have to hire employees without discrimination.

Action by a Federal agency to carry out the requirements of this title may include the terminating of programs where discrimination is taking place or refusal to grant assistance to such a program.

Each agency is required to publish rules or regulations to carry out the purposes of the title. These rules and regulations are subject to the approval of the President.

Compliance actions are subject to the following conditions:

a. notice must be given of alleged failure to comply and an opportunity for a hearing must be provided;

b. in the event assistance is to be cut off, a written report must be submitted to Congress 30 days before the cut-off date;

c. compliance action may be appealed to the courts.

Social security and veteran's benefits, and other Federal benefits distributed directly to individuals are not affected by this law.

Federal assistance in the form of insurance or guaranty—for example, FHA insured loans—are not covered by this title (however, the President's Executive Order prohibiting discrimination in Federally aided housing remains in effect).

Title VII

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

This title establishes a Federal right to equal opportunity in employment. It creates an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to assist in implementing this right.

Employers, labor unions and employment agencies are required to treat all persons without regard to their race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. This treatment must be given in all phases of employment, including hiring, promotion, firing, apprenticeship and other training programs, and job assignments.

When this title goes into full effect employers will be subject to its provisions if they have 25 or more regular employees in an industry that affects interstate commerce. Generally speaking, labor unions will be subject to the Act if they either operate a hiring hall for covered employers, or if they have 25 or more members who are employed by a covered employer. Employment agencies are also included if they regularly undertake to supply employees for a covered employer.

(Enforcement of the nondiscrimination requirements for employers and unions is postponed for one year. Employers and unions with 100 or more workers will be covered beginning July 2, 1965 and coverage will be extended each year until July 2, 1968 when employers and unions with 25 workers will be covered.)

Not covered by this title are (1) public employers, (2) bona fide private clubs, (3) educational institutions with regard to employees working in educational activities and all employment in religious educational institutions, (4) employers on or near an Indian reservation with regard to preferential treatment of Indians; and (5) religious corporations, institutions, etc., with regard to employees working in connection with religious activities.

When someone believes he has been discriminated against because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in any phase of job placement or employment, he may bring his complaint within 90 days to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission or to the Attorney General.

The Commission will handle his complaint directly, unless the State or locality where the alleged discrimination occurred has fair employment laws. If so, the person complaining must allow the State or local officials no more than 120 days to resolve the matter. If there is no satisfactory conclusion within this time or if the State or locality rejects the complaint before the time is up, the complainant may then go to the Commission, which is authorized to settle valid complaints by conciliation and persuasion. Nothing said during the conciliation proceedings may be made public or used as evidence without the consent of the parties.

If the Commission fails to secure compliance within a period of no more than 60 days, the individual may take his case to a Federal court. This court may appoint an attorney and may exempt the complainant from payment of certain costs. The court, in its discretion, may allow the Attorney General to enter the case.

A worker who thinks he has been discriminated against may take his complaint directly to the Attorney General, who may bring the case before a three-judge court if he believes there is a pattern or practice of resistance to this title.

If the court in either action finds discrimination, it will order the employer, employment agency or union to take corrective action, which may include hiring or reinstating employees with or without back pay.

Title VIII

VOTING STATISTICS

The Secretary of Commerce is required to conduct a survey of persons of voting age by race, color, and national origin and to determine the extent to which such persons have registered and voted in such geographic areas as the Commission on Civil Rights recommends.

A similar survey must also be conducted on a nationwide basis in connection with the 1970 Census. No person questioned during such surveys may be compelled to disclose his race, color, religion or national origin and everyone must be advised of his right to refuse to give this information.

Title IX

INTERVENTION AND REMOVAL IN CIVIL RIGHTS CASES

The Attorney General is authorized to intervene in any Federal court action seeking relief from the denial of equal protection of the laws on account of race, color, religion or national origin. If a Federal court refuses to accept a civil rights case and sends it back to a State court, this action may be reviewed on appeal.

Title X

COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE

A Community Relations Service is established in the Department of Commerce to provide assistance to persons or communities requiring help with civil rights problems where discriminatory practices impair constitutional rights or affect interstate commerce. The Service is authorized to cooperate with both public and private agencies, either on its own initiative or upon request from local officials or interested persons in situations where disputes threaten peaceful relations among the citizens of a community.

In addition, the Service is authorized to seek a voluntary settlement of public accommodation complaints which may be referred to it by a Federal Court. The Act directs that all activities of the Service in providing conciliation assistance shall be conducted in confidence and without publicity.

Title XI

MISCELLANEOUS

This title gives a right to jury trial in criminal contempt cases arising out of Titles II, III, IV, V, VI and VII. Title I retains the more limited jury trial provisions of the 1957 Civil Rights Act.

Appropriations are authorized to carry out the Act, and a separability clause provides that the rest of the Act will be unaffected if any portion is invalidated. Another section preserves existing remedies under Federal law. This title also preserves the rights of the States to legislate in the same areas covered by this Act, so long as such legislation is not inconsistent with the purposes of the Act.

Guidelines for School Desegregation

A Summary Explanation of the Revised Statement of Policies
For School Desegregation Plans
Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
Office of Education
Equal Educational Opportunities Program

The 1966 Title VI Guidelines for School Desegregation

The 1966 Guidelines require:

1. Substantial achievements under free choice desegregation plans,
2. Significant progress in desegregation of teachers and staff,
3. Progress in closing of small, inadequate schools established for Negro students or other minority groups,
4. Simplified procedures and periodic reports from school districts to measure progress in implementing desegregation plans.

Assurance

To be eligible for Federal funds, each school system must assure the Commissioner that it will abide by Title VI of the Civil Rights Act. The type of assurance varies with the nature of the school system:

Desegregated Systems

A school district that never had or has already eliminated a segregated system submits an assurance of full compliance by HEW Form 441.

Dual School Systems

School systems that are working toward desegregation submit either a Federal court order for desegregation or a voluntary desegregation plan. School systems with voluntary plans file Form 441–B, which provides that a school system's voluntary desegregation plan will be carried out in accordance with the standards outlined in the 1966 Guidelines.

Performance

Any compliance assurance or plan is essentially a statement of intent, and is not a substitute for performance. The Commissioner may require additional assurance or evidence of performance if he has cause to believe that a school system is not living up to its original assurance.

Types of Plan

No single type of desegregation plan fits all school systems. Each school system is responsible for selecting the plan best suited to accomplish desegregation as quickly as possible. However, if the Commissioner has cause to believe a plan will not work in a particular district or has evidence that a previously accepted plan is failing, he may require the adoption of a different plan.

A. General Requirements

The school system—not the State or Federal Government—is responsible for making its plan work. The system must inform the community of its plan, solicit community support, and take the necessary steps to protect all persons exercising their rights under the plan.

The Guidelines require periodic reports to help the Commissioner determine a system's progress under its plan. These reports include data on student and faculty assignment by race and school; notification of any changes the system seeks to make in its plan; and descriptions of special circumstances hampering the progress of desegregation.

B. Attendance Zone Plans

Under this type of plan, students are assigned to schools within a school system according to their area of residence. The school system must establish a single set of attendance zones, and then assign students to schools serving their zone regardless of race, color, or national origin.

Students with special educational needs—handicapped children, for example—can be assigned to a school outside their normal attendance zone.

C. Free Choice Plans

These plans require students to choose their own school, regardless of where they live. The expectation is that students of each race will choose the same school and thus break down the dual school pattern.

Every student and his parent must choose a school each year . . . in most cases 4 or 5 months before the school year begins. The school system must ensure that this choice is free, and that students and parents can choose in safety and without fear of reprisal.

School systems must make significant progress in eliminating the dual school pattern under free choice plans. Progress in the transfer of students from segregated schools will be measured in relation to achievements of prior years and will be judged in accordance with the Federal court rule that school districts which start late must move faster in desegregating their schools.

Desegregation of Faculty

The 1965 Guidelines required at least a first step toward faculty desegregation through integrated staff meetings in the first year. The1966 Guidelines require actual desegregation in the school staff.

In general, school systems with separate white and Negro faculties must either assign staff in such a way as to produce some faculty integration in every school, or use some other pattern of staff assignment which will make comparable progress in bringing about staff desegregation successfully.

The 1966 Guidelines also include safeguards against discriminatory hiring, firing, promotion, and extension of tenure. They do not violate a system's right to administer its staff according to professional criteria, but they do require that such practices not result in discrimination by race, color, or national origin.

Desegregation of Facilities

Any facility or activity—including athletics, transportation, parent-teacher or student assemblies, extracurricular programs, special educational opportunities—identifiable as being school-related must be open to all appropriate persons without discrimination.

Summary

The basic concept behind the design of the 1966 Guidelines is substantial progress in each district beyond what it achieved under the 1965 Guidelines.

The basic criterion for the Commissioner's interpretation of these Guidelines is measurable evidence of progress and good faith effort to eliminate the dual school system as quickly as possible.

TEXT FOR ANNUAL LETTER TO PARENTS

For Use During 30-Day Spring Choice Period

(Required by §181.46 of the Statement of Policies)

(IF SEPARATE SCHOOLS HAVE BEEN MAINTAINED FOR OTHER THAN NEGRO AND WHITE STUDENTS, TEXT IS TO BE ADJUSTED ACCORDINGLY)

(School System Name and Office Address)

Dear Parent: (Date sent)

Our community has adopted a school desegregation plan. We will no longer have separate schools for children of different races. The desegregation plan has been accepted by the U.S. Office of Education under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The plan requires every student or his parent to choose the school the student will attend in the coming school year. It does not matter which school the student is attending this year, and it does not matter whether that school was formerly a white or a Negro school. You and your child may select any school you wish.

A choice of school is required for each student. A student cannot be enrolled at any school next school year unless a choice of schools is made. This spring there will be a 30-day choice period, beginning ----------, 1966, and ending ----------, 1966.

A choice form listing the available schools and grades is enclosed. This form must be filled out and returned. You may mail it in the enclosed envelope, or deliver it by hand to any school or to the address above any time during the 30-day choice period. No one may require you to file your choice form before the end of the choice period. No preference will be given for choosing early during the choice period.

No principal, teacher or other school official is permitted to influence anyone in making a choice. No one is permitted to favor or penalize any student or other person because of a choice made. Once a choice is made, it cannot be changed except for serious hardship.

Also enclosed is an explanatory notice giving full details about the desegregation plan. It tells you how to exercise your rights under the plan, and tells you how teachers, school buses, sports and other activities are being desegregated.

Your School Board and the school staff will do everything we can to see to it that the rights of all students are protected and that our desegregation plan is carried out successfully.

Sincerely yours,

Superintendent.

TEXT FOR NOTICE TO BE PUBLISHED IN NEWSPAPERS, DISTRIBUTED WITH LETTERS TO PARENTS, AND OTHERWISE MADE FREELY AVAILABLE TO THE PUBLIC

(Required by § 181.46 and 181.53 of the Statement of Policies)

(School System Name and Office Address)

NOTICE OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION PLAN UNDER TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

THIS NOTICE IS MADE AVAILABLE TO INFORM YOU ABOUT THE DESEGREGATION OF OUR SCHOOLS. KEEP A COPY OF THIS NOTICE. IT WILL ANSWER MANY QUESTIONS ABOUT SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

1. Desegration Plan in Effect

The _____ public school system is being desegregated under a plan adopted in accordance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The purpose of the desegregation plan is to eliminate from our school system the racial segregation of students and all other forms of discrimination based on race, color, or national origin.
(Name of school system)

2. Thirty-Day Spring Choice Period

Each student or his parent, or other adult person acting as parent, is required to choose the school the student will attend next school year. The choice period will begin on _____ and close _____, 1966.

3. Explanatory Letters and School Choice Forms

On the first day of the choice period, an explanatory letter and this notice will be sent by first-class mail to the parent, or other adult person acting as parent, of each student then in the schools who is expected to attend school the following school year. A school choice form will be sent with each letter, together with a return envelope addressed to the Superintendent. Additional copies of the letter, this notice and the choice form are freely available to the public at any school and at the Superintendent's office.

4. Returning the Choice Forms

Parents and students, at their option, may return the completed choice forms by hand to any school or by mail to the Superintendent's office, at any time during the 30-day choice period. No preference will be given for choosing early during the choice period. A choice is required for each student. No assignment to a school can be made unless a choice is made first.

5. Choice Form Information

The school choice form lists the names, locations and grades offered for each school. The reasons for any choice made are not to be stated. The form asks for the name, address and age of the student, the school and grade currently or last attended, the school chosen for the following year, the appropriate signature, and whether the form has been signed by the student or his parent. [If choice form asks for the student's race, color, or national origin, insert the following sentences: "The race, color, or national origin of the student is requested for purposes of recordkeeping required by the U.S. Office of Education. The information will not be used in any way to discriminate against the student."] Any letter or other written communication which identifies the student and the school he wishes to attend will be deemed just as valid as if submitted on the choice form supplied by the school system. The names of students and the schools they choose or are assigned to under the plan will not be made public by school officials.

6. Course and Program Information

To guide students and parents in making a choice of school, listed below, by schools, are the courses and programs which are not given at every school in this school system.

> [Here list, by schools, each course and program, such as special education, foreign languages, vocational education, science, commercial courses, and college preparatory courses offered at a particular school which is not offered at the same grade level at every other school in the system. It must include courses and programs offered in grades not yet generally reached by the desegregation plan.]

7. Signing the Choice Form

A choice form may be signed by a parent or other adult person acting as parent. A student who has reached the age of 15 at the time of choice, or will next enter the ninth or any higher grade, may sign his own choice form. The student's choice shall be controlling unless a different choice is exercised by his parent before the end of the period during which the student exercises his choice.

8. Processing of Choices

No choice will be denied for any reason other than overcrowding. In cases where granting all choices for any school would cause overcrowding, the students choosing the school who live closest to it will be assigned to that school. Whenever a choice is to be denied, overcrowding will be determined by a uniform standard applicable to all schools in the system.

9. Notice of Assignment, Second Choice

All students and their parents will be promptly notified in writing of their school assignments. Should any student be denied his choice because of overcrowding he will be promptly notified and given a choice among all other schools in the system where space is available.

10. Students Moving Into the Community

A choice of school for any student who will be new to the school system may be made during the spring 30-day choice period or at any other time before he enrolls in school. An explanatory letter, this notice and the school choice form will be given out for each new student as soon as the school system knows about the student. At least seven days will be allowed for the return of the choice form when a choice is made after the spring 30-day choice period. A choice must be made for each student. No assignment to any school can be made unless a choice is made first.

11. Students Entering First Grade

The parent, or other adult person acting as parent, of every child entering the first grade, or kindergarten [delete "or kindergarten" if not offered], is required to choose the school his child will attend. Choices will be made under the same free choice process used for students new to the school system in other grades, as provided in paragraph 10.

12. Priority of Late Choices

No choice made after the end of the spring 30-day choice period may be denied for any reason other than overcrowding. In the event of overcrowding, choices made during the 30-day choice period will have first priority. Overcrowding will be determined by the standard provided for in paragraph 8. Any parent or student whose first choice is denied because of overcrowding will be given a second choice in the manner provided for in paragraph 9.

13. Tests, Health Records and Other Entrance Requirements

Any academic tests or other procedures used in assigning students to schools, grades, classrooms, sections, courses of study, or for any other purpose, will be applied uniformly to all students without regard to race, color or national origin. No choice of school will be denied because of failure at the time of choice to provide any health record, birth certificate, or other document. The student will be tentatively assigned in accordance with the plan and the choice made, and given ample time to obtain any required document. Curriculum, credit, and promotion procedures will not be applied in such a way as to hamper freedom of choice of any student.

14. Choices Once Made Cannot be Altered

Once a choice has been submitted, it may not be changed, even though the choice period has not ended. The choice is binding for the entire school year to which it applies, except in the case of (1) compelling hardship, (2) change of residence to a place where another school is closer, (3) the availability of a school designed to fit the special needs of a physically handicapped student, (4) the availability at another school of a course of study required by the student, which is not available at the school chosen.

15. All Other Aspects of Schools Desegregated

All school-connected services, facilities, athletics, activities and programs are open to all on a desegregated basis. A student attending school for the first time on a desegregated basis may not be subject to any disqualification or waiting period for participation in activities and programs, including athletics, which might otherwise apply because he is a transfer student. All transportation furnished by the school system will also operate on a desegregated basis. Faculties will be desegregated, and no staff member will lose his position because of race, color or national origin. This includes any case where less staff is needed because schools are closed or enrollment is reduced.

16. Attendance Across School System Lines

No arrangement will be made, or permission granted, by this school system for any students living in the community it serves to attend school in another school system, where this would tend to limit desegregation, or where the opportunity is not available to all students without regard to race, color or national origin. No arrangement will be made, or permission granted, by this school system for any students living in another school system to attend school in this system, where this would tend to limit desegregation, or where the opportunity is not available to all students without regard to race, color or national origin.

17. Violations To Be Reported

It is a violation of our desegregation plan for any school official or teacher to influence or coerce any person in the making of a choice or to threaten any person with penalties or promise favors for any choice made. It is also a violation of Federal regulations for any person to intimidate, threaten, coerce, retaliate or discriminate against any individual for the purpose of interfering with the free making of a choice of school. Any person having any knowledge of any violation of these prohibitions should report the facts immediately by mail or phone to the Equal Educational Opportunities Program, U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C., 20202 (telephone 202-962-0333). The name of any person reporting any violation will not be disclosed without his consent. Any other violation of the desegregation plan or other discrimination based on race, color, or national origin in the school system is also a violation of Federal requirements, and should likewise be reported. Anyone with a complaint to report should first bring it to the attention of local school officials, unless he feels it would not be helpful to do so. If local officials do not correct the violation promptly, any person familiar with the facts of the violation should report them immediately to the U.S. Office of Education at the above address or phone number.

FEDERAL RIGHTS UNDER SCHOOL DESEGREGATION LAW

STAFF PAPER PREPARED FOR THE

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

TO THE

U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

March 1966

Free choice plans for desegregating schools under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 tend to place the burden of desegregation on Negro students and their parents.[1/]

The vast majority of plans submitted by school authorities in Deep South States have been "Free Choice" plans. Out of the 97 plans accepted by the Office of Education from South Carolina, 92 employ the "Free Choice" method. Six school districts are operating under court orders. According to estimates made by the Southern Education Reporting Service in December 1965, the number of Negroes attending school with white students in South Carolina was 3,864 or less than two per cent of the State's Negro school population.

At the request of the South Carolina Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, the Commission staff prepared this paper to assist Negro pupils and their parents in understanding their rights under current Federal school desegregation law.

1/ U.S. Office of Education (Dept. H.E.W.) Revised Statement of Policies for School Desegregation Plans Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, March 1966.

1. DESEGREGATION PLANS

Q. HOW CAN I FIND OUT IF MY SCHOOL DISTRICT RECEIVES FEDERAL MONEY?

A. Most school districts receive Federal assistance. You can find out about your school district by writing to the U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C.

Q. IF IT DOES RECEIVE FEDERAL MONEY WHAT REQUIREMENTS MUST IT MEET?

A. If a school district is not under court order to desegregate, it must either be desegregated or follow a plan for desegregation of students, teachers, facilities, transportation, services, etc. If it is under court order, it must obey the court order. If it does not meet any of these three requirements, the Office of Education may refuse to give Federal money to that district. In addition, a suit can be brought by a parent or organization.

Q. WHAT KINDS OF DESEGREGATION PLANS ARE ACCEPTABLE?

A. There are several kinds of desegregation plans acceptable to the Federal government. Most of the communities in the South use a "Freedom of Choice" plan. Others divide the community into attendance areas and assign each child to the school for his area. Some districts close small Negro schools and assign the Negro children and teachers to white schools. Still others put only a few grades in each school and assign children by grade regardless of race.

Q. HOW LONG WILL THE PLANS TAKE TO ACHIEVE DESEGREGATION OF ALL GRADES?

A. Most of the plans called for desegregation of all 12 grades for the 1965-66 school year. All plans must provide for desegregating 12 grades by 1967-68.

Q. WHAT IF MY CHILD'S GRADE IS NOT YET COVERED BY THE DESEGREGATION PLAN?

A. The child can transfer to a white school under any of the following conditions: (1) his present school does not offer the course of study he desires, (2) he wants to attend a desegregated school already attended by a brother, sister or any relative living in his household, (3) he meets all the requirements for transfer under ordinary circumstances, (4) he would otherwise have to attend school outside of the school district.

Q. WHAT IF MY CHILD IS ENTERING THE SCHOOL SYSTEM FOR THE FIRST TIME IN A GRADE THAT IS NOT COVERED BY THE CURRENT "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" PLAN?

A. He may attend the school of his choice.

Q. HOW WILL I KNOW IF MY SCHOOL DISTRICT HAS A "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" PLAN?

A. Most school districts in the South use "Freedom of Choice" plans. If the district is under this plan, each pupil and his parents will receive a letter in the spring explaining their rights under the plan along with a Choice of School Form and a notice explaining the plan.

Q. WHAT WILL THE "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" LETTER SAY?

A. The letter will come from your school superintendent in the spring. It will ask parents and pupils to choose a school within 30 days. The choice form will list all schools that you may choose from (both white and Negro) and their grades and locations. The notice will explain the plan in detail.

Q. WILL STUDENTS WHO RETURN THEIR FORMS EARLY HAVE A BETTER CHANCE OF GETTING INTO THE SCHOOL OF THEIR CHOICE?

A. No. All letters must be mailed to parents on the first day of the choice period. There can be no preference given to those who return their forms early in the 30-day period.

Q. CAN THE CHILD CHOOSE HIS OWN SCHOOL?

A. Yes, if he is fifteen years old or will enter grade 9, 10, 11 or 12 next year.

Q. WHAT IF I DON'T RETURN THE CHOICE FORM DURING THE 30-DAY CHOICE PERIOD?

A. You may return it at any time before the child begins school next year. If the form is not filled out by the end of the first week of school, the child will be assigned to the school nearest his home where space is available, without regard to race.

Q. CAN A TEACHER OR PRINCIPAL TELL ME WHICH SCHOOL TO CHOOSE?

A. No. You and your child decide which school he will choose. Teachers, principals and other school officials may not tell you which school to choose or to influence your choice in any way.

Q. CAN MY CHILD'S NAME BE PRINTED IN THE NEWSPAPER OR PUBLICIZED IF I CHOOSE A WHITE SCHOOL?

A. No. It is a violation of Federal regulations to publicize information about choices made by individual students or about the schools to which they are assigned.

Q. WHAT IF ONLY A FEW NEGRO CHILDREN ENTER WHITE SCHOOLS IN MY SCHOOL DISTRICT UNDER A "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" PLAN?

A. If your school district has a sizable percentage of Negro children and most of them are still in Negro schools, the Federal government can require the school district to take additional actions to desegregate, such as holding a new choice period, increasing teacher desegregation, or putting into effect some other kind of plan.

2. COURT ORDERS

Q. WHAT IS A SCHOOL DESEGREGATION COURT ORDER?

A. A School Desegregation Court Order is the instruction given by the court after a school district has been sued and found to have been maintaining segregated schools. It tells the school district what it must do to achieve desegregation.

Q. WHAT IF THE SCHOOL DISTRICT DECIDES TO DO WITHOUT FEDERAL MONEY - AND CONTINUES TO HAVE SEGREGATED SCHOOLS?

A. The law requires a school district to desegregate whether or not it receives Federal money. If a school district has been sued and ordered to desegregate it must obey the court's order. If it has not been sued, one or more parents or an organization can sue a school district to force it to desegregate. If a parent can't afford to sue, cannot get a lawyer, or is otherwise unable to sue, he can make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C. and ask the Federal government to sue.

Q. HOW DO I FIND OUT IF MY SCHOOL DISTRICT IS UNDER COURT ORDER?

A. To find out about your district, write to the Office of Education, Washington, D.C. or the Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C.

Q. HOW DO I FIND OUT WHAT MY SCHOOL DISTRICT MUST DO UNDER THE COURT ORDER?

A. Since court orders are often hard to understand, you might ask a lawyer to explain it to you. He, or you, can get a copy from the Clerk of the Federal Court for a fee.

Q. HOW CAN A COURT ORDER BE CHANGED TO BRING ABOUT FASTER SCHOOL DESEGREGATION?

A. One or more parents or an organization can sue a school district for a better method of school desegregation. Parents can also make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C. asking the Federal government to sue.

3. VIOLATIONS AND COMPLAINTS

Q. WHAT CAN I DO IF LOCAL OFFICIALS DO NOT OBEY THE DESEGREGATION PLAN OR COURT ORDER?

A. You can make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice and to the Equal Education Opportunities Program, U. S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C.

Q. HOW DO I KNOW WHETHER TO SEND MY COMPLAINT TO THE OFFICE OF EDUCATION OR THE DEPT. OF JUSTICE?

A. To be sure it gets to the right one, send the same information to both.

Q. WHAT INFORMATION SHOULD BE IN THE COMPLAINT?

A. The complaint can be a letter. It should contain the facts you are complaining about, including the name and address of the schools involved, names of people, dates of incidents, and any other details that you are able to give.

Q. DO I HAVE TO SIGN THE COMPLAINT?

A. You must sign all complaints to the Dept. of Justice, but it is not necessary to sign complaints to the Office of Education. However, it makes it easier for them to investigate if they know who complained. If you do not wish to give your name, just write out what happened and mail it without signing it.

Q. CAN I COMPLAIN TO THE OFFICE OF EDUCATION BY TELEPHONE?

A. Yes. The number in Washington, D. C. is (202) 962-0333. Ask for the Equal Educational Opportunities Office and tell them you have a complaint.

Q. WHERE ELSE MAY I SEND A COPY OF MY COMPLAINT?

A. You may send a copy of your complaint to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Washington, D. C. You should also keep a copy for yourself.

Q. AFTER MAKING A COMPLAINT, WHAT KIND OF RESPONSE SHOULD I EXPECT?

A. You should expect a letter acknowledging that your complaint has been received. In some cases a Federal representative may come to discuss it with you. He will have identification to show that he is a Federal official. In other cases he may telephone you.

Q. WHAT IF I RECEIVE NO ANSWER?

A. If you do not receive an answer within a reasonable period of time, you should write or call Washington again to see if your complaint has been received, and what is being done about it.

4. PROTECTION

Q. WHAT KIND OF PROTECTION SHOULD I EXPECT FOR MY FAMILY IF I AM ONE OF THE FIRST TO SEND MY CHILD TO A WHITE SCHOOL?

A. The school authorities are responsible for seeing that no student or staff member interferes with persons exercising rights under the plan or affected by it. Such protection must be given both on and off the school grounds. If they can't provide necessary protection they must seek assistance from other officials.

Q. WHAT IF WE DO NOT RECEIVE PROTECTION FROM LOCAL AUTHORITIES?

A. Notify the nearest FBI office. Also, make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C. and to the Equal Educational Opportunities Program, Office of Education, Washington, D.C.

5. NEWLY DESEGREGATED SCHOOLS

Q. WHAT ABOUT TRANSPORTATION TO SCHOOL?

A. Whatever transportation is provided for white children must also be provided for Negro children.

Q. WHAT SHOULD I EXPECT IN THE WHITE SCHOOLS IN TERMS OF DESEGREGATION OF FACILITIES, SERVICES AND ACTIVITIES?

A. The law says that there can be no discrimination in school facilities, services and activities. This includes sports participation, social and educational activities, drinking fountains, washrooms, lunchrooms, classroom seating, auditoriums, locker rooms, use of materials, buses, etc. Also, Negro parents can attend PTA meetings, commencement exercies and all other school events.

Q. WHAT IF MY CHILD IS TREATED BADLY AND INSULTED IN A NEWLY DESEGREGATED SCHOOL BY TEACHERS AND OTHER STUDENTS?

A. It is the responsibility of school officials to see that these things don't happen. You can make a complaint to the local school officials or to the Equal Educational Opportunities Program, U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D. C. and Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Washington, D. C. or to all of these.

Q. WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO NEGRO TEACHERS AS SCHOOLS ARE DESEGREGATED?

A. It is a violation of Federal regulations for a school system to dismiss, demote or pass over teachers for retention, promotion or rehiring because of race. If a teacher must be displaced because of desegregation, no teacher from outside the system can be brought in unless the displaced teacher is not qualified to fill the vacancy. If the district is going to have fewer teachers because of desegregation it must retain those who are best qualified regardless of race. Where teachers need to upgrade their skills the Federal government finances programs to train them to be better teachers.

Q. WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR TEACHER DESEGREGATION?

A. The superintendent and school boards have the responsibility for hiring and assigning teachers. They are required to desegregate teaching staffs. A Negro teacher who wishes to be assigned to a white school can so advise the proper school officials in the district.

Q. WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT DIFFERENT SALARIES FOR WHITE AND NEGRO TEACHERS?

A. It is a violation of the Constitution for school authorities to pay different salaries to teachers based on race. A teacher or a group of teachers or a teachers organization can sue the school officials to force them to equalize pay. The Attorney General can join in the suit.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

On The Record

New Commissioner Of Education

Columbia Record 2/11/66

By JOHN A. MONTGOMERY

Brash Francis Keppel used to tell audiences when he was U. S. Commissioner of Education that if there was a question between integration and education, integration would always come first.

He attempted to withhold $30 million in federal aid from Chicago schools because of racial segregation. He told Sigma Chi fraternity that unless it integrated, his agency would withhold aid from colleges that had chapters. His arrogance created chaos in American education.

Keppel was moved out and up to a job created for him as assistant secretary of the Health, Education and Welfare Department. Recently he has been looking into educational development in South Viet Nam, which has much greater problems than segregation.

MONTGOMERY

The man who succeeded him is an aggressive, imaginative, dedicated educator, Harold Howe II. If Howe's philosophy prevails, the education system in the United States will rise to new heights of service not only to all races, but also to all intellectual levels.

"Doc" Howe is a unique educator. He gets his nickname from the fact that he has not earned a doctorate. His only degrees are A. B. and M. A., but he enjoys the respect and admiration of the most titled professors and school administrators.

Teaches Himself

Twice in his teaching career he was required to take certain post-graduate courses in education in order to qualify for positions to which he had been promoted. In both cases the local colleges did not offer the courses, but employed Howe to teach them.

The new commissioner will have to deal with tough problems of integration under federal laws and great pressure by civil rights organizations, but the nature of the man will not allow him to subordinate education to social reform. His primary concern is the quality of education and doing what is good for education.

Rather than the tyrannical approach of Keppel, he has adopted a policy of reasoning, partnership and commonsense application of the laws. The laws are directed against de jure segregation in the South, but Howe is fully aware of de facto segregation in the North. His teaching career was in the North until two years ago when he acepted a challenge as director of North Carolina's Learning Institute, a pioneer program in training children of poor families.

He believes in a broad-based public education program. Instead of continuing the three high school tracks bound to college, business and technical employment, he would widen the corridors so that no graduate would be limited to a single vocational area. Most individuals change their vocations three times in a lifetime.

Harold Howe II

He favors revised and improved curriculums and teaching methods. The schools were teaching 18th century physics and mathematics until Sputnik spurred the educators into modernization. He would like to see similar dramatic change in the teaching of other subjects.

Feeling that often it is the schools and not the students that fail, he would adjust the schools to the children, not to the teachers and administrators. He favors the full development of the "C" student as well as the brilliant scholar. He thinks there is too much emphasis on the how-to-do-it phase of education and not enough on citizenship preparation.

Teaching, to "Doc" Howe, is like playing tennis or golf; the only way to learn it is to do it. He thinks most education courses should be on the postgraduate level.

Three Billion Dollars

He favors an open policy for community colleges, which he says serve a tremendous need. They are valuable to the adult who wants literacy help, the high school graduate who wants to develop a skill, and the student who wants a college degree at low expense. Comprehensive service and quality should not be sacrificed to admission standards that bar the ambitious citizen who wants to better himself.

Howe is one of the most powerful men in the national government. He is in charge of the expenditure of three billion dollars in federal funds this year. Next to Defense Secretary Robert McNamara, he heads the fastest growing agency in Washington, one that doubles in personnel every year.

He gives the impression of a man ideally suited for the job.

U.S. Backs Pupil Choice of Schools

2/16/66 ED-FED-GEN

By JOHN HERBERTS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — The controversial freedom-of-choice plan for desegregation of schools will be permitted under new guidelines to be announced soon by the Office of Education.

But the guidelines will contain stiff new requirements intended to prevent school boards from using free choice as a means of avoiding integration. Civil rights groups have asked abolishment of the free-choice plan, under which pupils choose the school they wish to attend.

The guidelines are expected to be similar to recommendations submitted to the Office of Education today by the United States Commission on Civil Rights, following a study of desegregation of schools in the South and Border States under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI bans racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

A stringent new court plan for the desegregation of schools in Lowndes County, Alabama, announced last week, is said to fall within the general framework of the new executive requirements under Title VI.

Under a consent decree in United States District Court in Montgomery, Ala., Lowndes County is required to desegregate all but four grades next fall and the four remaining ones by the fall of 1967. Facilities must be integrated.

Students in all grades will be required to indicate the school of their choice, but any student who has not indicated his choice within a week after school opens will be assigned to the school nearest his home in which space is available.

Assignment is to be made without regard to race or color. Prior attendance at a school will not give a student priority.

Lowndes County, which has a high Negro population and a low per capita income, is said to have agreed to the new Federal requirements and to agree to receive funds under the new Secondary Education Act rather than make a court fight.

The Civil Rights Commission agreed with private civil rights groups that freedom-of-choice plans permitted last year had been used to perpetuate a dual system in many counties.

"The slow pace of integration in the Southern and Border States is in large measure attributable to the manner in which free-choice plans — the principal method of desegregation adopted by school districts in the South — have operated," the report said.

Most school boards in the South submitted freedom-of-choice plans in the belief that they would result in less integration than geographical zoning on a nonracial basis.

The Office of Education, the commission said, should reject freedom-of-choice plans when the following conditions exist:

¶Negroes have been intimidated and coerced to remain in their own schools and the school authorities do nothing to stop the practice.

¶The white child enrolled in an overcrowded school is given priority over a Negro child who lives closer to the school.

¶Students failing to make a choice of school are assigned on a racial basis.

¶School authorities fail to discipline students who harass Negro students because they have integrated the school.

The commission, an independent research agency, said that despite a large increase in the number of school districts beginning desegregation last year "not more than one Negro child out of every 13 in the Deep South actually attends school with white children."

In a statement one of the commission members, the Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University, said freedom of choice could never work perfectly until the "formerly all-Negro, presumably inferior schools" are brought up to standard.

"At this precise time of transition, why not institute along with the whole process of desegregation in the South a positive program of upgrading all teachers in the present systems," he wrote. "In fact, the best teachers of either race, worthy of their profession, should be put in the schools, needing the most help to improve."

"If this positive action could be moved along quickly," he said, "then we could eliminate the present cat-and-mouse game which is going on between the Federal Office of Education and the local Southern school districts."

The new guidelines are to contain provisions for faculty desegregation.

Another commissioner, Eugene Patterson, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, said in another concurring statement that Southern school districts had made a meaningful beginning.

"Even though Negro enrollment in the first year [of the Civil Rights Act] was predictably slow," ht said, "it indicates to me that most communities of the South have caviled but that they have met their test well, made their basic decision to comply with the law, and passed their most difficult time, so that good faith and fairness toward all of the South's school children need not any longer be an issue."

Whites Paid More, Negro Teachers Say

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 2/23/66

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP)—Negro schoolteachers in at least three Southern states have protested that white teachers are receiving higher pay for the same type of work.

The protests, from Negro teacher organizations in Arkansas, Georgia and South Carolina, came as the movement to combine traditionally white and Negro teacher organizations continued.

The developments were reported Tuesday by the Southern Education Reporting Service and other sources.

The service said the protests over alleged unequal pay for white and Negro teachers took these forms:

In Arkansas, the Arkansas Teachers Association, a Negro group, asked the U.S. Office of Education to "consider withholding all federal funds" from school districts in the state which maintain separate salary schedules for Negro and white teachers. The ATA reported, for example, that the Brickeys School District paid white teachers an average annual salary of $3,600, while Negroe's averaged $3,387. Supt. W. E. Osborn responded that all teachers in his district now are on the same schedule.

In Georgia, the Negroes' Georgia Teachers Education Association said the "vast majority" of Georgia school systems are guilty of some form of racial discrimination in teacher salaries. Dr. Horace Tate, executive secretary of the group, said it, too, would seek a request for a halt to federal funds if salaries were not equalized.

Court Pushes Integration In 3 Georgia Counties

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 2/24/66

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP)—A three-judge federal court Wednesday refused to relieve the State Department of Education of its receivership duties with the Taliaferro County school system and ordered state school Supt. Jack Nix to investigate charges of discrimination of Negro pupils in Wilkes and Greene counties.

U.S. Circuit Judge Griffin B. Bell, spokesman for the panel, ordered Nix to file an interim report on his findings within two weeks.

Nix was ordered to investigate claims by Negro pupils transferred from Taliaferro that segregated seating arrangements existed in the Washington-Wilkes County High School and Warren County High and that complete cafeteria privileges were not afforded Negroes at Wilkes.

Following testimony at a hearing, Bell also ordered the education department to determine why a court order allowing Negro pupils from Taliaferro County to attend schools of their choice was apparently circumvented.

He also told Mrs. Lola Williams, superintendent of Taliaferro County's school system, to prepare a desegregated school program for the coming year.

The hearing came on a motion by the Justice department charging the Taliaferro County Board of Education with failing to operate a school system without racial distinction. It also sought a court order to integrate all facilities of schools in Wilkes, Warren and Greene counties.

Rozzell Says U.S. Fits School Plans To Political Need

From Gazette Press Services

ARKADELPHIA — The federal government is sacrificing chances for real Negro freedom by gearing its education program for political gains, Forrest Rozzell, executive secretary of the Arkansas Education Association, charged Friday.

Rozzell said the government had abandoned thoughtful inquiry and basic realities in pursuit of quick, but only superficial, success.

"They refuse to recognize that the evil consequences of a lifetime of discrimination cannot be overcome by the simple act of desegregating the schools," he said.

He said the racial revolution's effect on education was a complicated problem in a complex society, and the federal government had contributed to the confusion.

"Already at least five departments of the federal government, and heaven only knows how many agencies, are vying with each other in establishing 'educational' policies and programs," Rozzell said. "The public schools are caught in the middle of this."

Rozzell made his remarks in the keynote address before an Institute on Education and Desegregation jointly sponsored by Henderson State Teachers College and the Office of Education.

Five Thorny Problems In Integration Listed

He said there were at least five thorny problems that must be solved if desegregated education is to move ahead to genuine, permanent success.

NEW RACE PREJUDICE: "Negro intellectuals, Black Muslims and many well-intentioned civil rights leaders, are dangerously fanning the same prejudices against whites that Negroes have long suffered in reverse."

ties, professional staff, monetary and moral support."

Rozzell said "no teacher has the right of employment or status by virtue of race — only by virtue of competence."

Lists Plans He Says Should Be Developed

He said that all members of the professional staff of each school district need to be systematically involved in developing and executing plans for:

★ Helping direct the sweeping social changes, which are designed to help the Negroes, along the most just, most hopeful and least destructive paths.

★ Helping to develop a more adequate understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of the sub-cultures from which Negroes come.

★ Developing ways to adjust the educational programs to the ways of life of the Negroes they are trying to reach.

★ Learning more about the characteristics and educational needs of the Negroes.

★ Finding ways and means of adapting methods and techniques to fit the characteristics and needs.

★ Learning how not only to do something for the Negroes but also to help the Negores do more for themselves.

★ Increasing the communication between school and community.

★ Developing mutual confidence

Five Thorny Problems In Integration Listed

He said there were at least five thorny problems that must be solved if desegregated education is to move ahead to genuine, permanent success.

NEW RACE PREJUDICE: "Negro intellectuals, Black Muslims and many well-intentioned civil rights leaders, are dangerously fanning the same prejudices against whites that Negroes have long suffered in reverse."

THE NEGRO FAMILY: "Nearly 25 per cent of Negro marriages are dissolved and 25 per cent of all Negro births illegitimate. One out of four Negro families is headed by a woman as the result of divorce, separation or desertion. The first need is to break the vicious cycle that links the Negro matriarchal society with delinquency, crime and poverty."

He cited a Labor Department report for his statisitcal material and said that "the intolerance of dissent and the political fear to express dissent endangered by civil rights groups has resulted in a practical suppression of this document."

STATE'S RIGHTS: "The confusion is compounded by diverse and conflicting views on federal power, both North and South. Those in the North who most vehemently support federal intervention in civil rights matters in the South are equallly vehement against federal involvement in the economic, sociological and basic educational aspects of the problem."

DISPARITIES IN EDUCATION: "There is no anthropological evidence of racial inferiority or superiority. I am talking about disparities in achievement and competence which are the inevitable consequence of disparities in educational opportunities."

DESEGREGATION AND NEGRO TEACHERS: "The professional security of the Negro teachers of the South has depended upon the protective walls of segregated schools. The end of legal segregation in schools is increasing the vulnerability of Negro teachers to competition from white teachers."

Rozzell called for compensatory education to bring the competence of Negro teachers to a higher level so there will be no need for them to fear this vulnerability.

He urged compensatory education for Negro children who have been handicapped by being limited to an inferior educational system.

"Deterioration in teaching and learning is not an inevitable consequence of desegregation," he said. "What is required to prevent this from happening are school policies, programs, facilities, professional staff, monetary and moral support."

Rozzell said "no teacher has the right of employment or status by virtue of race — only by virtue of competence."

★ Developing mutual confidence between the school personnel and the parents of the Negroes.

★ Creating an understanding on the part of all concerned that the results are not likely to be quick and miraculous.

Institute Ends Today After Several Talks

Rozzell's speech marked the opening of the Institute, which ends today.

Addresses today include one at 9 a.m. by Dr. Carl Kreisler of the division of secondary education of Western Kentucky State College, and one at 1 p.m. by Dr. E. C. Stimbert, superintendent of Memphis public schools.

The Institute will end with an evaluation by Dr. Marie Barry of the Office of Education.

Rights Compliance Tempo Stepping Up

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26—Last year was for breaking new ground. The time has come for growing some results.

John W. Gardner

There is substantial evidence that local agencies in the South receiving U.S. funds can expect this kind of timing for compliance with the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

A new man in Washington figures to be one of the major factors. He is quiet-tempered John W. Gardner, secretary of the sprawling Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Gardner put out information last week that demonstrates he is trying to snip some of the red tape that has bound efforts to realistically enforce Title VI of the civil rights law.

The Office of Education has all but put the final touches on a new set of guidelines for desegregation of school systems. The new regulations are almost certain to plug some loopholes in the freedom-of-choice plans for school attendance.

The Justice Department is entering school desegregation cases in federal courts at a faster pace.

AS COULD BE expected, neither of the adversaries — Southern segregationists and civil rights groups — will be satisfied with the rate of change.

For one, changes come too quickly; for the other, too slowly.

Secretary Gardner admitted his department has faced "considerable administrative difficulties" in implementing Title VI. Ultimate sanction of that section of the civil rights law is withholding of funds from agencies not in compliance with anti-discrimination regulations.

Gardner's statement was issued in response to a U.S. civil rights commission report, which said discrimination is still widespread in health, welfare and education programs assisted by federal funds.

"Recognizing that our efforts have just begun," said Gardner, "I acknowledge the constructive value of the commission's recommendations."

THIS IS WHAT he said he plans to do:

—Give top priority to recruitment of civil rights personnel and the initiation of programs to achieve compliance in hospitals, educational institutions, and state health and welfare programs.

—Expedite administrative hearings to cut off funds to institutions persisting in discriminatory practices.

—Speed the process of obtaining simultaneous, community-wide compliance of all recipients of funds.

—Establish reporting systems to identify areas of noncompliance; not only the absence of segregation by all citizens in the "full range of federally aided programs."

If Gardner accomplishes aims that he has set forth, local agencies can expect a closer watch on their activities.

After the signing of nondiscriminatory pledges, Southern officials can anticipate visits by federal investigators to ascertain whether promises are being kept.

THEN COMES THE moment of truth for both the federal government and the local agencies — whether and when to cut off funds for violators.

So far, authority to withhold funds has amounted to little more than a threat in the background.

Another obvious fact is this: Few local or state agencies can continue to operate at their present level — if at all — should federal funds be taken from their budgets.

Best School For Children

Civil rights committees in Southern states still come up, all too often, against blind and unreasoning local positions and decisions. That there is progress is reassuring. An increasing number of communities which sincerely have sought to avoid honest decision and acceptance of the law as the Congress intended it to apply have found the old fears to be nonexistent and acceptance of law, therefore, unexpectedly easy. This is another development on the asset side. "We went ahead and did what we were ordered to do," said a school superintendent in a county ordered to desegregate its schools," and nothing happened. We were shocked — pleasantly — and wondered what it was we had feared." This is not an unusual story. But it cannot be had where the leadership itself accepts fear and uses it to evade what must be done.

Investigating committees have had testimony that in some counties where compliance agreements were signed to avoid loss of federal school funds there have been silent campaigns of intimidation. Parents with children whom they wished to put in the better school — the one for white children — were privately warned not to press for admittance. Various methods of spreading the coercive warnings were employed — none "official."

Transfer Trouble

These examples are numerous and invite pessimism. But they also are examples of local failure.

Any community, where acts of intimidation have prevented carrying out the agreement of compliance, confesses that its local church leadership and the influence of its "best people" are nonexistent. Such things cannot happen in communities where the ministers, the local business and professional leadership say "No."

That there are communities which still wish to close doors — not open them — is a melancholy commentary on their awareness of their place in this time and present. The South has an educational opportunity not available to any other region. That the quality of our education, our school plants, equipment, the training and pay of our teachers, and the amount spent per pupil are below the national average is not disputed. That the average school for Negroes is below the standard school for white children is also undenied. That Negro teachers, on the average, have had less opportunity for training than their white contemporaries also is an accusing statistic.

What, then, would be a simple step that could be taken by a community that wishes to upgrade its educational facilities? It would be quicker to eliminate the separate facilities which for generations have handicapped all children and to put all available funds, including federal help, into the very best possible school, or schools, for all the children. There is no reasonable excuse to perpetuate bad schools by the various devices now being employed to delay combining all resources to give all Southern children the best possible schools.

This would involve remedial classes for some who have been held back by teaching and conditions that work against advancement comparable with that had by pupils lucky enough to have the best qualified teachers and conditions of study and learning above the average. This is a strong reason to have "the best possible school system," not an argument for delay. Many white children also need screening for remedial instruction.

Sitting in class receiving instruction is not a social exercise. It never was. The school dance is not an educational process. Let it be abandoned. Education — the best education possible — should be the goal. It is attainable if honestly sought.

Macon Hears Schools Face Justice Study

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

MACON, Ga. (AP)—The Department of Justice is considering reopening cases in which school systems are integrating under a court order but not in accordance with the latest guidelines laid down by the U.S. commissioner of education, a federal official said Thursday.

Stanley Kruger, area director of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Equal Educational Opportunities Program, made the statement during a statewide school integration conference sponsored by the Georgia Human Relations Council and the American Friends Society. Those hearing Kruger were predominantly Negro.

Kruger said that generally speaking new regulations do not apply to systems that are proceeding with integration under a court decree. However, he said these systems are being required to furnish progress reports to the commissioner of education.

The day-long program included workshops on various problems involving integration of schools throughout the state.

Education Chief Asserts New Guidelines May Double Integration—No Similar Move Is Planned for the North

3/8/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 7 — The Office of Education announced today that it would require desegregated teaching staffs next fall in Southern school districts receiving Federal funds.

This is one of several new requirements contained in 1966 guidelines that the Office of Education has adopted for enforcing school desegregation under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, disclosed the new requirements at a news conference. He said in response to a question that it was his "guess" that the guidelines would double the amount of school integration in 11 Southern states. At the same time, Mr. Howe made it clear that the Office of Education would continue to concentrate on the South for at least another year and that there were no immediate plans for moving against discrimination in Northern school under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

Title VI is intended to ban racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

The office will continue to accept pledges of compliance from Northern districts while requiring Southern and border state districts, which have maintained dual school systems, to submit desegregation plans. Mr.

SCHOOLS IN SOUTH GET BIAS WARNING

Howe said in a response to a question that if the new guidelines work as well as expected there may be more integration in Southern schools than now exists in many areas of the North.

Enforcement of Title VI in the Southern schools began last year. Of some 2,000 districts that had maintained segregation by official policy all but about 70 submitted desegregation plans under the 1965 policy.

These complying school districts pledged to begin desegregation during the current school year and to carry it to all 12 grades by the fall of 1967.

As a result, about 180,000 Negro students, roughly 7 per cent of the total, are attending school with whites in the 11 Southern states.

This was considerably less integration than the Office of Education and civil rights groups had hoped to attain in the first massive desegregation attempt by the Executive Department.

More Reviews Planned

Mr. Howe said, however, that the office had achieved "paper compliance" in the South.

"We can look forward to more emphasis on compliance reviews, field visits and investigations in order to determine actual performance in making equality of educational opportunity available to all members of our society," he said.

The Office of Education considers faculty desegregation important both for achieving desegregation of pupils and for improving the quality of schools that have been all Negro. The only requirement this year was that faculty meetings be integrated.

The pattern in the typical Southern community has been for an all-Negro faculty to serve in an all-Negro school and for a few Negroes to be enrolled in a formerly all-white school with an all-white faculty.

Under the new guidelines, districts will be given several alternatives for beginning faculty desegregation. An integrated staff will not be required in every school within a district.

"Race, color or national origin may not be a factor in hiring, assigning, promoting or firing teachers and other professional staff," Mr. Howe said.

"Staff desegregation for the 1966-67 school year must include progress in the desegregation of the regular teaching staff beyond what was accom-legration than the Office of Education and civil rights groups had hoped to attain in the first massive desegregation attempt by the Executive Department.

"Staff desegregation for the 1966-67 school year must include progress in the desegregation of the regular teaching staff beyond what was accomplished in 1965-66," he continued, "and there must be a significant start on this in those school districts that have not yet begun faculty desegregation."

Resistance Expected

Mr. Howe said a great deal of resistance was expected in this area and as a result teachers associations were being asked to help smooth the way.

The new guidelines are long, complicated and legalistic and seem sure to bring renewed complaints from Southern school officials that they do not know what the Office of Education is talking about.

Mr. Howe said that to avoid some of the confusion that occurred last year, school districts would be required to submit preliminary reports this spring containing a plan for the fall and an "intention of mix," or the amount of integration contemplated.

During the summer the office, with an increased enforcement staff, is to see that the plans are carried out.

In addition to faculty desegregation, the guidelines contain these two significant requirements:

¶Small inadequate schools maintained for Negroes or other minority groups must be closed and the students assigned to other schools in the district.

¶"Freedom of choice" plans, which most districts adopted in order to escape with the least integration possible, will be accepted only if they produce a significant amount of desegregation.

Transfers Must Double

For instance, a district that had eight or nine per cent of its pupils transfer from segregated schools last year will be expected to have at least twice that many transfers next year. The lower the transfer rate last year, the higher the rate must be next year.

Meanwhile, Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, said he had grown tired of waiting on the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, of which the Office of Education is a part, to move against racial imbalance in Northern schools.

Mr. Powell introduced a bill today that he said would lead to full integration by 1970. It would provide $600-million to be parceled out to cities that bring about integration of both student bodies and faculties.

Mr. Powell, who is chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, said that from that committee he had convened an "ad hoc subcommittee on de facto school segregation" to study racial imbalance in large cities.

The Representative had announced a similar project last year but held only a few days of hearings on the Chicago school situation.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Southern school systems were told Monday thatthey will be required to at least double the number of Negroes attending classes with white pupils and integrate faculties by September.

For Georgia as a whole, school systems may be required to more than triple Negro enrollment in formerly white schools.

These requirements — excepting only special cases — were contained in 10 pages of new guidelines issued by the U.S. Office of Education.

The alternative to compliance, said officials, is the loss of federal funds, which have grown to a substantial part of budgets for local school systems.

At the same time, Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II acknowledged that the federal government has no plan to move immediately against de facto segregation in the North.

The commissioner said a new civil rights law probably will be needed to cope with de facto segregation.

Howe declared at a press conference where he outlined the new guidelines for Southern schools, "This year the emphasis will shift from negotiation to performance."

In Atlanta, State School Supt. Jack P. Nix said local school superintendents will have a chance to question a representative of the U.S. Office of Education about the guidelines this week.

He said he has arranged for Stanley Kruger to brief superintendents in Atlanta on Wednesday, in Metter Thursday and in Albany Friday.

"This will bring local officials face-to-face with a federal official so their will be no mistake about what is expected of them," Nix said.

Surgeon General William H. Stewart also announced at the press conference that guidelines for compliance with the 1964 Civil Rights Act have been mailed to the nation's 10,000 hospitals.

Stewart said an Office of Equal Health Opportunity has been established to enforce compliance with the guidelines for hospitals and other medical facilities.

Howe said the Office of Education plans to increase its compliance staff from 50 to 126 to review desegregation plans and to make field investigations in both the North and South.

The education commissioner said his office will take closer looks this year at Southern school desegregation plans based on geographical zones and freedom of choice. Plans designed to perpetuate segregation will not be approved, he said.

EXPECTED RESULTS

No matter what type of plan is submitted by a local school system, these are the results expected by the Office of Education:

1. If a system transferred 8 to 9 per cent of the Negroes from a segregated school this year, at least twice that number would "normally be expected" in September.

2. In the case of 4 to 5 per cent transferred, the number would be expected to triple next term.

3. Where the transfer percentage was lower than 4 per cent, the increase is expected to be "proportionately" greater than triple.

Georgia has 1.3 per cent of its Negroes in formerly white schools this year, according to the Southern Regional Council.

Commissioner Howe noted that Southern schools this year were permitted to move toward desegregation of professional staffs by holding integrated meetings of school personnel.

BI-RACIAL FACULTIES

The new regulations say systems must have bi-racial faculties for compliance.

Where teachers are displaced by desegregation, the guidelines say administration officials may not go outside the system to fill a vacancy unless the officials can show a displaced staff member is not qualified to fill the vacancy.

Five options are offered by the guidelines for desegregation of faculties. No percentage for staff desegregation is fixed by the guidelines.

If small schools — particularly those created to segregate Negroes — are determined to provide educational opportunities inferior to others in a system, the local district would be required to reassign the students to other classrooms and close the school.

BY APRIL 15

The guidelines require school systems to file reports witr the education commission by April 15 listing anticipated enrollment by grades and race for the term beginning in September.

Local school officials also must report by April 15 planned assignment of teachers for the coming year.

Then, 30 days after school opens in the fall, local systems must report actual teacher assignments and enrollments according to race and grade.

Local systems will be allowed to follow court-ordered desegregation plans, said Howe, although the Office of Education's goal still is desegregation of all grades in Southern schools by the beginning of the 1967 school year.

Integrate Faculty, Schools Ordered

School Desegregation

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, March 8—The federal government said that desegregation of school faculties must begin this fall and that small, inadequate Negro schools must be closed.

At the same time Monday, the first general guidelines for hospital desegregations were announced, and hospitals were warned that if they persist in racial discrimination, they will be excluded from the Medicare program which begins July 1.

The new guidelines were issued by two agencies within the U.S. Health, Education and Welfare Department—the Office of Education and the Public Health Service.

The new school rules reflect a tougher attitude for enforcing Title 6 of the 1964 Civil Rights Act forbidding federal aid in programs where there is racial discrimination.

THE OFFICE OF Education said it will require "substantial achievements" in school districts which are using freedom of choice desegregation plans.

The free choice plans, allowing a student to go to whatever school he wants to, have been one of the most controversial features of the federal government's efforts to bring desegregation.

Most of Georgia's school districts, especially those which had no desegregation before, set up free choice plans last fall. But in Georgia and other states, civil rights groups contend fear and intimidation have prevented Negroes from transferring freely to previously all-white schools.

Apparently to meet these objections, the Office of Education set up a set of percentages by which they will measure the effectiveness of free choice plans. If desegregation does not reach those percentages, the federal agency may require adoption of some other type of desegregation plan.

THE OFFICE of Education said that every student and his parent must choose a school every year and that the school system "must insure that this choice is free and that students and parents can choose in safety and without fear of reprisal."

The new guidelines say that, in general, there must be "some faculty integration in every school" in the fall of 1966.

Last year's guidelines required no actual desegregation of faculty.

The guidelines go further than ever before to try to wipe out dual school systems.

Education Commissioner Harold Howe said that much of the past year was spent in negotiating with school districts on desegregation plans, and "in the end the effort did not achieve one of its main purposes."

HE SAID THAT very few school districts made any real effort to devise plans to desegregate their school systems effectively.

So he said in the coming year, "the emphasis will be shifted from negotiation to performance." The Office of Education will require periodic reports on progress and there will be more investigation of complaints in the field.

He also announced the establishment of an Office of Equal Health Opportunity to enforce nondiscrimination in federal hospital and medical aid programs.

Guidelines for desegregation set up by the Public Health Service allow no racial separation in facilities, treatment, staff, training programs or other services related to hospitals.

THE GUIDELINES specify there must be no discrimination in inpatient and outpatient care, that there must be biracial occupancy of multibed rooms and wards and that patients must be not asked if they are willing to share a room with persons of another race.

Employes, medical staff and volunteers must be assigned to patient services without regard to race, and courtesy titles must be used throughout the hospital in connection with both staff and patients.

Permanent and temporary staff privileges must be carried out in a nondiscriminatory way and all aspects of training programs, including recruiting of trainees, must be nonbiased.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

By MARGARET SHANNON

Atlanta Journal Washington Bureau, National Press Building

WASHINGTON, March 8—New federal guidelines for school desegregation are tougher and tighter—on paper—than existing regulations.

They make it sound as if the U.S. Office of Education means business about cutting off federal funds to school districts that do not comply.

But the 1965 guidelines sounded that way, too—and no money has been cut off yet, though some has been held up in a comparatively few instances.

But Southern officials cannot complain, as they did last year from governors on down, that the 1966 regulations are inexact. They are detailed enough to answer, on close reading, almost any question.

The new guidelines cover, in one way or another, many of the major objections of civil rights groups made since the 1965 regulations went into effect.

THE TEST of their effectiveness will come in the enforcement. The enforcement staff will be about doubled—to about 120 They have some 2,000 school districts to ride herd on.

In broad terms, the main requirements of the 1966 guidelines are:

1. Substantial achievements under freedom of choice desegregation plans.

2. Significant progress in desegregation of teachers and staff.

3. Progress in closing small, inadequate schools for Negroes.

4. Simplified procedures and periodic reports from school districts to measure desegregation progress.

IN GEORGIA, 164 of 179 school districts submitting plans last year to the Office of Education chose the freedom of choice way to desegregation. (Other districts in the state either did not submit plans or were using court-ordered plans.)

The 1966 regulations say that the most substantial indication as to whether a free choice plan is working is the extent to which Negroes have transferred from segregated schools.

When school districts using free choice report this spring to the federal agency on how many transfers are in view for next fall, here are the percentages the Office of Education will use in deciding whether free choice is working:

1. If 8 or 9 per cent transferred from segregated schools in 1965, twice as many transfers would be expected next fall.

2. When 4 or 5 per cent transferred in 1965, three times as many transfers would be expected next fall.

3. If the 1965 percentage was lower than 4 or 5 per cent, the percentage next fall should more than triple.

4. If no students transferred last fall, then "a very substantial start would normally be expected to enable such a school system to catch up as quickly as possible with systems which started earlier."

IF A SYSTEM in the fourth category still can't get any transfers made under the free choice plan, the Office of Education may require it to adopt a different type of plan.

Twenty-seven school districts in Georgia with approved plans have no desegregation this year. They will be under particular pressure to produce some next fall.

Here are some of the other main points of the free choice plan requirements:

1. A student who will be in the ninth grade next fall or is 15 years old may make his own choice, and it takes priority over his parent's choice.

2. There must be a free choice every year, and not just once in a school-lifetime.

3. The period for making a choice must be at least 30 days, and the school system must send a letter, an explanatory notice and a choice form to each parent.

4. No reason for a particular choice, or any other information or witness or authentication, may be required on the free choice forms.

5. Once submitted, a choice may not be changed, except for a change of residence, special instruction needs or "compelling hardship."

This is no doubt designed to prevent such situations as in Sumter County, Georgia, where all Negroes who applied for transfers later withdrew them.

6. No choice may be denied for any reason except overcrowding. If overcrowding would result, students must be assigned on the basis of proximity of residence.

7. Buses must be routed to the maximum extent feasible to serve each student choosing any school in the system.

THE NEW GUIDELINES also put heavy responsibility on school officials for seeing that desegregation works and that Negro students and parents are protected against harassment and reprisal.

School officials are required to "take steps to encourage community support and acceptance of their desegregation plan" and to furnish full information about it to news media.

The regulations say that "within their authority, school officials are responsible for the protection of persons exercising rights under, or otherwise affected by, the plan.

Officials must "take appropriation action" against any student, teacher or staff member "who interferes with the successful operation of the plan, whether or not on school grounds."

THE REGULATIONS add: "If officials of the school system are not able to provide sufficient protection, they must seek whatever assistance is necessary from other appropriate officials."

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission reported last month that violence and intimidation have marked school desegregation efforts in some places in the South. Incidents in Americus and Sumter County were among those detailed.

Faculty desegregation — resisted vehemently last year by Southern school officials and governors—is a requirement now of all.

The regulation in effect require some faculty desegregation in every school—not just in every school district.

The guidelines say that small segregated schools should be closed. If they are inferior—and the implication is that Negro schools of this type most often are—they must go "immediately" and the students sent elsewhere.

HEW Guidelines Clearer

More than six months ahead of school openings next fall, the U.S. Office of Education has let Georgia school men know what desegregation steps they may expect to be required.

Commissioner Harold Howe acted early and spoke specifically. His new guidelines are reasonably drawn and carefully framed. As a result the state will be spared the confusions and upsets of 1965, when the requirements were cloudy or ambiguous. For talking straight, Commissioner Howe gets A.

Embodied also in these new guidelines is understanding as well as firmness. Harsh and extreme ideas were rejected by the dozens, as were soft and vague ones.

In sum, what is finally called for is:

First, "substantial achievements" in advancing pupil desegregation under freedom-of-choice plans. Percentage guidelines are suggested. They call roughly for a doubling of the number of Negroes in formerly white schools. Those schools which have done least this year will have to do most next year.

Second, "significant progress" in desegregation of faculties. Some type of faculty desegregation will be required in every school, not just in every school district.

Knowing clearly what must be done this far in advance, Georgia school systems can do it. The worst problems are past anyway. We have no doubt that Georgians will do more than abide by law this year, and will move on to school all children better and with less tension.

Very rapidly the problem of segregated education is shifting from the Southern schools, which are going forward, to the schools of other regions, where de facto segregation is quietly entrenched. In a year or two, given continuing Southern effort, the focus will shift to areas that may not have tried as hard.

State Told To Triple Integration

By JOE BROWN
Constitution Education Writer

Georgia school systems are expected to triple the number of Negroes attending previously all-white schools by next fall, a U. S. Office of Education spokesman warned here Wednesday.

Regional USOE Director Stan Kruger explained that new guidelines for desegregation directly affect individual schools, their student bodies and their faculties.

FACES LOSS OF AID

Each and every school that does not desegregate faces the danger of losing its federal aid starting in the fall, he said.

About 200 Georgia school superintendents and school board members meeting at the State Capitol grew more and more grim faced as Kruger closed legal loopholes and told them that now the USOE means business.

He said school systems must desegregate faculties "roughly proportional" to the ratio of white-to-Negro students. This does not mean hiring and firing on a racial basis, Kruger said, but it does mean that if existing teachers are properly distributed among the schools of a system, the proportions will probably be about the same as student desegregation.

4,240 NEGROES NOW

He said that by fall Georgia's 4,240 Negroes now going to classes in previously all white schools will be expected to triple.

The USOE will issue minimum standards of compliance annually "until we have reached the basic objective that schools will be operated without discrimination on the basis of race, creed or national origin," he said.

"It is not enough that schools be in paper compliance," he warned, adding that if USOE feels that a system is not achieving substantial integration through its present plan it will be required to submit another.

Raged on elderly grey haired school official who was vigorously applauded:

"The Irish came over here and made their way. The Poles came over here and made their way. The Jews came over here and made their way.

"Why are we called upon to make the Negroes' way?"

He also told Kruger that integration of faculties will pull down the level of education in Georgia because Negro teachers are not as competent as white teachers.

Kruger said that no system will be required to keep teachers that are incompetent.

"The only requirement where a reduction in staff is necessary is that race not be a factor in the dismissal," he said.

"I don't think a Negro parent would want his child taught by an inferior teacher, no more than would a white parent," Kruger observed.

He told the school officials that they have until April 15 to amend existing dual school systems or be ruled in violation of the federal guidelines.

"Current programs will continue to receive funds," he said, "but terminating procedures will be started and future funds will be denied if amendments are not submitted."

Kruger is also expected to brief other school officials about the guidelines in Metter Thursday and in Albany, Friday.

Race Distinction in Schools Must Go, Educators Told

AJ 3/14/64

By WAYNE KELLEY

The U.S. Office of Education in direct, almost blunt terms, has notified Georgia educators of new school desegreation requirements so tough that last year's seem pale by comparison.

The goal of the guidelines for 1966-67 is outwardly simple: Erase all distinctions which tend to identify schools as either Negro or white.

Federal emphasis for the next school year will definitely be on desegregation of public school faculties. This was made clear Wednesday by Stanley Kruger, a U.S. Office of Education official with responsibility for Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina.

Mr. Kruger conducted a four-hour briefing session for 250 state and local education officials at the State Capitol. A long question and answer period provoked some angry inquiries from the audience and several pointed replies by the federal administrator.

The new guidelines make mandatory for the first time integration of teaching staffs in southern districts. In addition many school systems will be required to double or triple the number of Negro students now attending desegregated classes for next fall.

The new policy puts responsibility for accomplishing these desegregation objectives squarely on the shoulders of local boards of education.

THE GUIDELINES, explained at great length by Mr. Kruger, severely restrict leeway under freedom of choice desegregation plans — the kind submitted by a big majority of Georgia systems.

The federal government is setting a quota for each system to meet, the USOE administrator told local educators. Districts which have desegregated schools for 8 per cent of their Negro students will be expected to double this effort to 16 per cent, he said.

If a district this year has only 4 per cent of its students in desegregated schools it will have to triple that number to 12 per cent. Systems with no desegregation at all will have an immediate quota of 10 per cent.

These are "minimum expectations," Mr. Kruger told his glum audience.

He brushed aside protests that local boards might not be able to transfer white teachers to Negro schools under requirements for desegregation of all faculties.

"It is not sufficient to say that a teacher will not volunteer," Mr. Kruger stated. "They are the responsibility of the board. If we are going to leave faculty desegregation on the basis of willingness, we aren't going to have any desegregation."

Mr. Kruger also said, in effect, that local boards must see to it that the student desegregation quota is met whether parents choose to transfer their children or not.

SHOULD A SYSTEM not meet its goal, the office of education will most likely rule that some method of pupil assignment other than free choice must be uesd, he commented. This could substitute a zoning system in many cases.

To insure compliance the government will require detailed statistical reports on the racial makeup of schools.

The focus of the government will be on performance, Mr. Kruger warned. "It will not be enough to be in paper compliance."

The USOE guidelines also say that transfers of pupils within or outside of a district will not be permissible when the transfer tends to reduce desegregation in either the sending or receiving system.

This transfer policy would seem to eliminate the compliance status of Warren, Wilkes, and Green counties if they continue to accept white and Negro transfer students from Taliaferro County. The only schools now operating in Taliaferro are Negro.

Last year the USOE compliance requirements for the 1964 Civil Rights bill were considerably softer. Faculty desegregation was only required for in-service training and staff meetings. There were no strict quotas.

As Mr. Kruger outlined specifics closing loopholes and toughening rules, his audience became more and more restive.

A grey-haired man who would only identify himself as "a former school board chairman" was loudly applauded when he rose to complain:

"The Irish came over here and made their way. The Poles came over here and made their way. The Jews came over and made their own way. Why are we supposed to make the Negroes way for him?"

MR. KRUGER replied pointedly that as he recalled it "the Irish and Poles and Jews have had access to public schools."

The USEO official frankly conceded that the new guidelines mostly apply in the South "since they refer only to school districts under voluntary plans." But USEO staff is spending twice as much time in Northern cities such as Boston and Chicago on compliance problems, he added.

Georgia school officials left the meeting in a glum mood.

School systems have a deadline of April 15 to report whether they will meet the new requirements. Systems using freedom of choice plans have a May 15 report date.

One attorney for a large county school board left the meeting with a comment which seemed to sum up the feelings of many officials.

"We are going to tell them we intend to comply," he said. "Then we are going to tell them to make us."

ber. Local systems would be required to integrate their faculties.

The Office of Education also tightened the regulations governing freedom of choice plans, the method most widely used in the South last year to begin meeting requirements of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

"I honestly think there ought to be more time for freedom of choice to work for the betterment of education," said Landrum. "After all, that is the ultimate aim, isn't it? That is the way I feel about it.

"If the purpose is to intermingle, then that can be done by force. I think the most fundamental civil right is a right to education. When we have that, our problems will be solved."

The congressman said his sole concern in protesting the guidelines is for continued development of education in the South.

"As badly as we need education today I don't see how we can cross it up with all the forced moving and unnatural environment and expect anyone to learn anything," he said.

"I think this freedom of choice plan would work itself out if left alone. This (desegregation) is a gradual process. A man isn't going to get a Ph.D. the first day he goes to school. He's got to work up to it."

Landrum on Schools: U.S. Pushing Too Hard

By REMER TYSON

WASHINGTON—The dean of Georgia's delegation in the U.S. House of Representatives declared Thursday that the Office of Education is "pushing too hard, too fast" to desegregate Southern classrooms and teaching staffs.

"They are asking too much," said Rep. Phil Landrum of new school desegregation guidelines issued earlier this week.

Landrum said he has already voiced objections to federal education officials.

"I don't know whether I'm getting anywhere," he added.

However, the usually reserved Ninth District congressman asserted his intention "to resist to the extent necessary to protect the educational system of Georgia and to protect the rights of citizens to an education."

'It's Right Thing,' Henderson Says

The Georgia Education Association will vote to drop its "white only" membership requirement when it meets in Atlanta next week, GEA President Zach S. Henderson predicted Thursday.

Dr. Zach Henderson

"It's the right thing to do," explained Henderson, adding that education associations in Georgia, Louisiana and Mississippi are the last three that have a color bar.

OKAY AMENDMENT

Last fall, GEA members voted 17,000 to 4,000 in favor of putting the constitutional amendment calling for the dropping of racial bars on this year's agenda.

A two-thirds majority of delegates voting at the convention is necessary for adoption of the amendment, Henderson said. GEA officials expect that 1,181 delegates will attend the three-day meeting, which begins on Wednesday.

The National Education Association, of which the GEA is an affiliate, adopted a resolution last year requiring state teacher organizations to end discriminatory practices.

OUSTER POSSIBLE

Failure to do so could result in ouster by the NEA, officials say.

Henderson also said that within five to 10 years there may be only one large statewide education association in Georgia. Negro educators are now represented by the Georgia Teachers and Education Association.

All Schools Must Obey, State Hears

ALBANY, Ga. (AP) — Schools which receive no federal aid still must desegreate, or face possible court action on the part of the Department of Justice, a federal spokesman said Friday.

Paul Kruger of the U.S. Office of Education said such a move is possible under provisions of the Civil Rights Act.

Kruger told some 125 persons attending a meeting to hear explanations of new school desegregation guidelines that it is up to them, as school administrators, to enforce the desegregation move.

FROM 50 COUNTIES

Kruger has given similar explantations before gatherings of Georgia educators in Atlanta and at Metter. Some 50 counties were represented at the meeting here, and about 20 per cent of the officials appeared to be Negro.

Kruger said there are about 70 school systems in Georgia which receive no federal aid, but they must follow the same guidelines of desegregation as other schools. He explained that faculties, school buses and other facilities also must be desegregated.

One official who was not identified asked Kruger what would happen in a county where the Negro population is about 68 per cent.

"Of course, they could move white pupils into Negro schools to achieve desegregation ratios," Kruger said. But he admitted this would possibly create "an area of friction."

20 PCT. LEVEL

He said that Negroes would be continued to be shifted to white schools as long as they didn't crowd them, and as long as they didn't exceed 20 per cent of the enrollment.

Another official, who also was unidentified, asked what would happen if a teacher declined to transfer to either a white or a Negro school.

Kruger said it was up to those attending the meeting, the school administrators, to persuade them if possible and to order them to transfer if necessary.

He said in the final decision, a superintendent could order a teacher to transfer, and if refused the teacher would be guilty of insubordination.

Racial Guides Irk Cobb School Board

AC - 3/13/66

By JOHN MEDLIN

A disgruntled Cobb County school board has laid tentative plans to oppose — or at least postpone — requirements set down in the revised 1966 guidelines for school desegregation.

The members had recessed their Wednesday meeting in order to hear a federal official in Atlanta explain the new rullings for the next school year.

In a late afternoon meeting Friday, board members expressed their resentment at changes in the school desegregation requirements. Jasper Griffin, county school superintendent, called them "unrealistic and unreasonable."

Cobb's desegregation plan, approved by the federal government last spring, is still valid in most respects. School board attorney Harry Willingham said that the main discrepency now lies in the fact that the system has not provided for desegregation of faculties.

Shortened deadlines were another cause for the board members' ire. Under Cobb's freedom of choice plan, students had from May 1 to June 1 to choose the school they wished to attend next year. The new guidelines specify that student decisions now be made during a 30-day period ending no later than April 30.

BOARD MEMBERS Tom Wootten prodded the other educators into seeking a possible postponement. Addressing Mr. Griffin as "the man who has spent all his life in education," he asked if the superintendent thought other systems would rally to fight the guidelines.

Mr. Griffin said he thought they would have to wait and see what reactions would be over the state. "They've popped this to us so late those who want to comply will be hard pressed to do it," he remarked.

GEA to Discuss Ban On Negro Membership

AC 3/13/66 SCHOOL DESEG.

School people from across Georgia will converge on Atlanta this week for the 99th annual Georgia Education Association convention.

Delegates will number 1,200, but the convention is expected to attract about 8,000 persons for various other meetings connected with the convention.

The hottest issue expected to come before the teachers is whether to remove restrictions which bar Negroes from membership in the 29,888-member professional organization. A proposed constitutional amendment to do this already has been approved by 17,000 of the members. It will require a two-thirds vote of the delegates to make the change.

A. J. STRICKLAND, superintendent of Trion City Schools, is the only announced candidate for president-elect. He would succeed Clyde W. Kimball, who becomes president, the first Atlantan to do so in 38 years. Dr. Zach Henderson, president of Georgia Southern College in Statesboro, is outgoing president.

Gov. Sanders is scheduled to speak at the convention Thursday night. U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe III will talk at a Friday breakfast of the Georgia Vocational Association.

Compliance Rules Perplex, Anger Educators Here

Metropolitan Atlanta school superintendents' reaction to new school desegregation guidelines ranged from anger to bewilderment, a check by The Atlanta Journal revealed Monday.

They generally were angry that local officials were not consulted when the guidelines were drawn, and bewildered as to how their school systems would be affected.

The U.S. Office of Education last week outlined the guides for school officials in the Atlanta area. School systems must follow them or face a cutoff of federal aid and court action.

Basically the new guidlines provide for biracial faculties in each school, the elimination of "Negro" and "white" schools and the elimination of segregation in athletics, transportation, parent-teacher associations, extra - curricular programs and similar projects.

Except in the area of faculty desegregation, the Atlanta School System already is substantially in compliance with desegregation guidelines laid down by the U.S. Office of Education, in the opinion of school Supt. John W. Letson.

For this reason, and another important one, the promulgation of the new federal guidelines hasn't caused any consternation among Atlanta school officials.

The other important consideration is that the Atlanta system has been desegregating these past five years under a federal court order and technically it isn't immediately affected by the Office of Education's new strictures.

It will continue to operate under orders of the court, according to Dr. Letson.

Not that this will necessarily preclude application of the new guidelines from Washington, for, as Dr. Letson says, "We will be involved in the immediate future in the same thing, in my judgment."

"WE'RE NOT planning to stand on that technicality (the fact the city's system is under duress of a court order)," says Dr. Letson. "We will proceed as in the past in the direction of full implementation of the court order. We have already gone a long way toward that implementation.

Renfro

Edmonds

"I think we will meet the test (of the new guidelines) in most respects except for faculty desegregation, and we have gone a long way in that direction.

"I think we would come very close to meeting the beginning regulations."

Dr. Letson adds:

"I certainly think that the future course of the Atlanta system will be voluntary action. Of course, you can never tell whether that voluntary action will be sufficient to eliminate the possibility of further court action. Certainly we have gone considerably beyond the requirement for faculty desegregation, but we have considerable faculty desegregation."

Forcing school children and teachers to function in schools not of their choice could create a bad situation, according to DeKalb County School Supt. Jim Cherry.

"The freedom-of-choice system is a far sounder basis on which to operate an educational system because it substitutes for the authoritarian viewpoint the counseling and guidance viewpoint."

Mr. Cherry is head of one of the largest systems in the state. Grades 1-12 in DeKalb show an enrollment of 70,500 children, of which 3,700 are Negroes—217 of these attending previously all-white schools.

DeKalb has no Negro teachers in predominantly white schools and no white teachers in Negro schools.

Supt. Cherry has been a strong advocate of freedom of choice for both teacher and pupil for many years. "We are presently evaluating the compliance plan," said Mr. Cherry. "I can't give any definite answer on the new order until we have finished with our study.

"I will say this," he added, "we have always complied with the law of the land."

The new guidelines are "going to knock back our school system several years," said Gwinnett School Supt. B. B. Harris.

THE BUFORD School System may be affected drastically. It has totally segregated schools for its 380 Negro and 850 white students.

There is an elementary and a high school for each group.

School Supt., J. R. Callison was reluctant to make any statement about the new compliance order. "I'd just rather not be quoted at all," he said.

MARIETTA AND Cobb County school systems, somewhat taken by surprise with the more stringent requirements, have not formulated any definite plans for meeting the challenge, according to superintendents Jasper Griffin and Loyd Cox. Neither system expects to have to produce a new compliance plan, however.

Mr. Griffin, the county school superintendent, said he thought it "unfortunate that HEW sees fit to move so drastically in such a short period of time, and on such short notice."

THE CLAYTON COUNTY School System, with less than one per cent of its Negro population attending integrated classes and no faculty integration, may experience some big changes if the federal guidelines are enforced.

Clayton will have to step up its desegregation. According to the guidelines, at least 10 per cent of the student Negro population would have to be in integrated schools.

With an estimated 1,600 Negroes attending school in Clayton, about 160 would have to go to integrated schools. This would mean that more than 100 Negro children would have to transfer next year.

Although Clayton has a centralized administrative setup and holds integrated staff meetings, the system has no integrated school faculties.

Decatur School Supt. Carl Renfro said the stricter federal rules for compliance with integration are a "move away from democracy."

"All they are doing is increasing central government control," he said, "and they are undermining their purpose which they hope to realize." Dr. Renfro says the freedom-of-choice method now employed in Decatur schools has been very satisfactory. "By taking away freedom of choice and attempting to force integration, federal officials will destroy the basis that makes integration tolerable."

Dr. Renfro declined to reveal the number of Negro children now attending predominantly white schools. He said such information would be interpreted "as too few by some and too many by others."

DECATUR'S 11 schools have 3,700 children attending them, 800 of which are Negro.

Fulton School Supt. Paul D. West has said previously that the new guidelines will produce some "explosive and untenable situations."

RIGHTS CHIEF HITS INTEGRATION RULE

Section of Guidelines Said to Make Delay Possible

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 13 — Negroes who pioneered school integration in many areas of the South stand to be penalized by new desegregation guidelines that were issued last week by the Office of Education, civil rights leaders are saying.

The guidelines, which could sharply increase the amount of classroom integration in the South next fall, are considered stringent in comparison to past standards. School districts under Federal court order, however, are specifically exempted.

Jack Greenberg, director-counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., said that most court orders now in effect fall "far short" of the standards in the guidelines.

Mr. Greenberg made the point that although most school districts were not under court order, most of the larger metropolitan areas and many rural counties were. He said court orders were in force where there had been an active civil rights movement. His organization now represents Negro plaintiffs in about 175 school cases.

"Negroes will be paying the penalty for insisting upon civil rights in the nineteen-fifties and the early nineteen-sixties," Mr. Greenberg said. "The only remedy the guidelines offer is the victim of segregation can go back to court."

The guidelines say:

"A school system under a court order for desegregation which is not in accord with the current judicial standards is subject to legal action by the Department of Justice, or by the parties to the original suit, to modify the order to meet current standards."

Judical standards established by United States Courts of Appeals are expected to correspond roughly to executive standards set by the Office of Education. In enforcement by the district courts, however, there is frequently a considerable lag.

Last year in Louisiana, for example, a number of school districts chose to invite court suits rather than submit desegregation plans to the Office of Education, in the belief that they could get by with less integration and still receive Federal funds.

The guidelines are issued under title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI is intended to ban racial discrimination in any federally assisted program. The Administration's goal is to complete desegregation of all 12 grades in every district in the South by the fall of 1967.

Several civil rights groups had asked the ffice of Education to require districts under court order to meet the executive standards. The American Friends Service Committee and the Legal Defense Fund said last fall in a memorandum to John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare:

"One reason why authority was given to the department is that many Federal judges take an extremely narrow view of how rapidly and how comprehensively school desegregation must proceed. Unquestionably the reason why authority was given to the department was to free the process of desegregation from the complexities of litigation and the limited views of many district judges on how fast and far desegregation must proceed."

Administration officials have said that they have felt reluctant to override the rulings of the judicial branch. They said that the guidelines issued this year and last were in line with recent court rulings.

Tobacco Spending Greater Than That for Hospital Care

CHICAGO, March 12 (AP)—Americans have been spending more for tobacco than for hospital care, and more for cosmetics, haircuts and toiletries than for doctor bills, the A.M.A. News, published by the American Medical Association, said Sunday.

Spending for health care totaled $25.2-billion in 1964, the latest year for which Department of Commerce figures are available, the article said.

The total spent for hospital care in 1964 was $7.6-billion, with $7.8-billion spent on tobacco products, the article said.

Last 'White' Parley Of GEA Set Today

The Georgia Education Association begins Wednesday what authorities predict will be its last "white only" annual convention.

On Friday the 1,180 delegates attending the four-day meeting at Atlanta's Marriott Motor Hotel will vote whether to remove the "white only" qualification for membership in the teachers' organization.

A poll has indicated that 80 per cent of GEA's 29,504 members favor the change. The only other state teacher groups that have not yet dropped racial barriers are in Mississippi and Louisiana.

The delegates will vote to adopt the constitutional amendment, says GEA President Zach S. Henderson, because "it's the right thing to do."

Scheduled to address the about 8,000 teachers and guests expected are Gov. Carl E. Sanders, U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe III and State School Supt. Jack P. Nix.

The theme of the 99th annual convention is "Improved Education — Georgia's Thrust."

A. J. Strickland, Trion school superintendent, is the only announced candidate for president-elect for 1966-67. If elected he will automatically succeed Clyde W. Kimball Jr., principal of Atlanta's Continental Elementary School.

Kimball is scheduled to be installed as president Saturday morning. He is Atlanta's first GEA president in 38 years.

The convention will open on Wednesday with the School Bell Awards dinner. Guest speaker will be J. C. Bostain of the Foreign Language Institute, Washington, D.C

The first general session will be Thursday evening. Gov. Sanders will speak.

Commissioner Howe will address the convention at a Friday breakfast meeting.

During the four days, nine GEA departments and 20 affiliate groups will conduct meetings and install officers.

Education Chief Backs Guidelines

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

By TOM GREENE AJ 3/17/66

The new U.S. Commissioner of Education said in Atlanta Friday the controversial new desegregation guidelines issued by his office "mean what they say" and will be enforced.

Harold Howe II, appointed education commissioner last January by President Johnson, made the remark in a press conference after he spoke at a breakfast sponsored by the Georgia Vocational Association. The breakfast was held in connection with the 99th annual convention of the Georgia Education Association.

During the speech, Mr. Howe called on Georgia teachers to "consider how you can act to help achieve our national objectives" in education.

At the press conference, the commissioner was asked how serious he considered the guidelines to be. He answered: "We mean what they say and we feel we will be able to follow through on these guidelines and make them work."

Turn to Page 6, Column 1

GUIDELINES DEFENDED

THE GUIDELINES laid down last week provide among other things for stepped up school desegregation and "substantial progress" in faculty desegregation.

Mr. Howe said, however, that "we recognize this (faculty desegregation) may not be possible in every school. We didn't make this a hard and fast" order to take care of those areas where there might be trouble.

A group of Georgia principals and board of education members are laying plans to seek congressional pressure on the Education Commission for delay of implementation of the guidelines. They also will ask Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton to file legal action against them.

Asked how effective he thought this would be, Mr. Howe said his office conferred with congressmen before issuing the guidelines and got legal opinions on them. Some congressmen, he said, criticized them as not being strong enough.

But he added that he thinks the congressional approach of the Georgians is the proper one. "I can't argue against their doing this, but we think we have set up a valid program."

MR. HOWE said he does not feel it is valid criticism of the guidelines to say they are hurting those systems who are trying to comply with the law. He pointed out that in over 100 southern school systems who had desegregation plans approved, there was no desegregation at all, and where there was some "we think there is a possibility for more progress."

He said flatly that the "overall intent of these guidelines is to remove from the educational scene the continued concept of the dual school system" which "represents discrimination" on its face.

During his speech, Commissioner Howe said the U.S. Constitution "leaves education entirely in the hands of the states" and "our founding fathers did not assign any responsibility for education to the federal government."

But, he added, there is a "growing strength of . . . local-state-federal partnership in education."

Mr. Howe said, "Local control is the best way to run the educational enterprise" but some weaknesses in the country's educational setup are difficult for local schools to cope with.

ONE PROBLEM he cited was population mobility, which has created a "geographical imbalance" in our local educational systems.

Such situations, he said, have "brought the federal government into education in a big way," listing the National Defense Education Act of 1958, Vocational Education Act of 1963 and 23 other pieces of federal education legislation passed in the last three years.

"These laws do not represent a new division of responsibility," he said, but they "do reflect a new partnership in education among the local, state and federal governments.

"They reflect in addition an awareness that this nation has a common life, and educational New Mexico affect Georgia and Illinois."

He added: "Far from removing any burden of educational leadership from individuals and local communities, the federal commitment to education offers even greater possibilities for initiative to every teacher, every school administrator, every businessman and citizen."

MR. HOWE did not in his prepared speech mention directly the new guidelines issued by his office requiring a stepup in school and faculty desegregation. These guidelines have stirred heated conversation during the GEA convention.

Meanwhile, GEA delegates were voting Friday on a proposed constitutional amendment which would remove restrictions barring Negroes from membership.

The issue was debated briefly during the first delegate session of the 99th annual GEA convention Thursday. While only four persons spoke, two for and two against the amendment, reaction to the speakers indicated that the delegates were overwhelmingly in favor of removing the restrictions.

Placing the amendment on the ballot was overwhelmingly approved by GEA membership in preliminary voting last fall.

The 1,200 delegates attending the convention Thursday heard their outgoing president, Dr. Zach S. Henderson, make a low-keyed but impassioned plea for changing the constitution.

"THIS IS life, this is 1966," Dr. Henderson said, adding that only Georgia, Mississippi and Louisiana teacher associations still have such restrictions, and Mississippi is getting ready to remove it from its constitution. He was given a standing ovation.

Gov. Sanders, in a speech to the convention Thursday night, said education is the answer to the problems facing the country today.

"These problems will never be solved merely by some federal program," he said. "Neither will education's problems be solved by guidelines. . . ." (This was an obvious reference to the new desegregation guidelines issued last week.

FRANK HUGHES, GEA executive director, Thursday urged the delegates to become involved in politics to the extent of letting the current crop of statewide candidates know how they feel about education matters.

He also made a pitch, without saying so in so many words, for a 1 per cent increase in sales taxes to finance what he terms will be a need for $100 million for education in the next three years.

A. J. Strickland, superintendent of Trion City Schools for 18 years and a native of Blackshear, was unanimously elected president elect of GEA Thursday. He will become president in 1967.

Atlanta's Clyde Kimball is scheduled to be installed as president Saturday morning, the final GEA session.

State's Schoolmen Fight Guidelines

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AJC 3/17/66

By TOM GREENE

Georgia school superintendents and members of boards of education have banded together to fight what one called the "autocratic edicts" of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare which last week ordered a stepup in desegregation.

About 50 superintendents, board members and other education officials met in Atlanta Wednesday to discuss the new desegregation guidelines issued by HEW, and most obviously were angry and puzzled.

Outgoing president of GEA calls for implementation of controversial Peabody Report —Page 4.

Out of the meeting came a seven-member steering committee which will draw up a plan of action to seek at least a delay in implementation of the new guidelines.

THE COMMITTEE is expected to recommend, among other things, that a delegation go to Washington to confer with Georgia's congressional delegation to get them to put pressure on HEW so educators will at least have more time to comply with the orders.

They also are expected to approach Georgia Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton to request him to seek some legal means of fighting the new desegregation orders.

The educators also will seek the aid of their counterparts in other states in trying to put pressure on HEW.

The new guidelines of HEW, among other things, said that school systems must make "substantial progress" by this fall on faculty desegregation and school integration or face cutoff of federal funds. It hiked the percentages of Negro students who must attend previously white schools and ordered that small, inadequate Negro schools must be closed altogether.

ONE SUPERINTENDENT, E. R. Cone of Thomas County, said Wednesday that "I am not going to be a party to assigning teachers and students to any schools" where they don't want to go. "There are other ways to make a living," he added. Mr. Cone said his board of education has offered to put up as much as $1,000 to help fight the HEW order.

Ralph Hood, Glynn County superintendent, who said the new guidelines threaten to "destroy public schools," said schoolmen would be "betraying our oath and our obligations" in carrying them out "and I am in favor of not doing it."

W. L. Robinson, chairman of the Fulton County Board of Education and past president of the National School Boards' Association, said "I feel like this is the time for the State of Georgia to lead the way and show some leadership."

Mr. Robinson, who branded the new guidelines as "bureaucratic, autocratic edicts," said he has been told by reliable sources that President Johnson is not going to back down on the matter and HEW "is going to see that these edicts are carried out," added:

"But if we put enough pressure behind this thing, we may not be able to reverse it but we could at least slow it down."

Mr. Robinson added that "This is not a southern problem, it is a national problem. We could probably work out a plan . . . but it isn't right, there's nothing just about telling a teacher 'you must go from your school' " to another one.

FULTON Supt. Paul West, who presided over Wednesday's meeting, suggested that the steering committee be appointed and asked to draw up the plan of action. He suggested the committee meet during the Georgia Education Association convention currently under way in Atlanta to draw up the plan, then present it to another meeting of the group next week. "Then we can move from that point."

Members of the steering committee are Claude Bray of Manchester, president of the Georgia School Boards' Association; Mr. Robinson; Roy Hendricks of Metter, chairman of the Candler County Board of Education; R. D. Blakeney, Gainesville superintendent; Mr. Cone; Gordon Holstun, superintendent of the Upson-Thomaston school system, and M. S. McDonald, Rome superintendent.

Long Look at Consequences

It has been a long hard road from Little Rock, via Oxford, Mississippi, into the present.

Lessons were learned along the way. These lessons come under the heading of "Consequences," "Cause and Effect," and "Alternatives."

The lessons learned have been accepted, in part, at least, by most of the major urban communities. After all, it has been almost 12 years since the U.S. Supreme Court school decision case of 1954. There has been adequate time in which to learn. Violence that necessitated federal troops in some communities and created general encouragement of defiance of legal processes involving schools and court orders by public officials, and private, no longer is likely in the larger urban centers in the Southern states. (The North's grievous burden is that of the large slum areas and of defacto segregation. Neither can be satisfactorily solved until the slums are replaced with housing developments that include for each a complex of elementary, secondary, and, perhaps, junior colleges and, or, modern vocational schools.)

Guide Lines

The guide lines recently announced by the U.S. Department of Education for the school year 1966-67 cannot be attacked as extreme or hurried. After all, as before noted, 12 years have passed since the Court, fully aware of the difficulties, suggested a deliberate course at deliberate speed, asking only good faith and honest effort.

The guide lines recently announced by the U.S. Department of Education for the school year 1966-67 cannot be attacked as extreme or hurried. After all, as before noted, 12 years have passed since the Court, fully aware of the difficulties, suggested a deliberate course at deliberate speed, asking only good faith and honest effort.

There still are some smaller towns and rural communities which have made no start at all. They have, almost incredibly, in the light of events and the alternatives, gone to the great trouble of carrying out a policy of circumvention — in many disguises. The years that could have been spent in honest, educational planning with the aid of the known — and respected — Negro leadership in their school systems have been lost.

An illustration from action taken only a few weeks ago provides a picture of circumvention. In one school system a number of families had asked for transfer to the best school. They were then approached individually and privately. Each set of parents was told that they were the only ones who had not withdrawn the request for transfer. It was then suggested that their child, or children, might be "very unhappy" as the "only" ones in an otherwise all white school. This deception was exposed. Transfers were made and no trouble ensued, but bitterness remains.

Circumventions

Other "circumventions" have been more ugly, involving threats and economic actions against parents.

Most persons now see that the region's most urgent need is the best possible education for all its children—and adults. Loss of federal funds would be a needless disaster. Yet, there are a number of towns and communities that in anger and resentment plan nothing at all except defiance. Angry protests and asking for more "time," after a dozen years of time in which no community meetings were held to work out a peaceful, slow program of compliance in the interests of their children, have a very hollow ring. Each of the resisting communities tends to think it is somehow "different" for a neighboring town or city that has successfully obeyed the law and courts. There can be only one "difference," leadership that is too frozen in prejudice to act.

There isn't a community that cannot manage to implement the new guidelines peacefully and happily—what is lacking is the will and the leadership to organize that will. Until local leadership assumes that responsibility, violence and hatreds will replace easily attainable educational advances.

Panel of 50 Fights School Integration Guidelines

By the Associated Press

A committee to fight new federal guidelines on school desegregation has been formed by about 50 Georgia school superintendents and members of boards of education.

A seven-man steering committee is expected to draw up plans to seek at least a delay in implementation of the guidelines. It is expected the group will request assistance from Georgia's congressional delegation and ask Attorney General Arthur K. Bolton to seek legal means of fighting the order.

W. L. Robinson, chairman of the Fulton County Board of Education and one of the seven named to the steering committee, said he has been told by reliable sources that President Lyndon Johnson is not going to back down on the guidelines. He said the Department of Health, Education and Welfare "is going to see these edicts are carried out."

Robinson said, "If we put enough pressure behind this thing we may not be able to reverse it, but we could at least slow it down."

"I am not going to be a party to assigning teachers and students to any school," said Superintendent E. R. Cone of Thomas County.

Glynn County Superintendent Ralph Hood said the guidelines threaten to destroy public schools. He said he was in favor of not carrying them out.

Fulton County Superintendent Paul West, who presided at the meeting, suggested that the steering committee draw up a plan.

Members of the steering committee are Robinson, Cone, Claude Bray of Manchester, president of the Georgia School Boards' Association; Roy Hendricks of Metter, chairman of the Candler County Board of Education and newly appointed to the State Board of Education; Superintendent R. D. Blakeney of Gainesville; Superintendent Gordon Holstun of the Upson-Thomaston school system, and Superintendent M. S. McDonald of Rome.

Says Integration Rules Curb Freedom of Choice

The Georgia Education Association voted more than 4 to 1 Friday to drop its "white-only" membership qualification then even more overwhelmingly passed a resolution denouncing the new federal school desegregation guidelines.

Of the 1,038 delegates voting on the membership issue in Atlanta at the annual GEA convention, 862 favored dropping racial barriers and 176 opposed it.

A two-thirds majority was necessary for passage of the constitutional amendment which immediately opens GEA membership to Negroes.

ONLY 2 STATES

Its adoption leaves only teacher organizations in Mississippi and Louisiana barring Negroes. The vote was taken by machine.

When a voice vote was taken on the federal guidelines resolution only about three faint cries of "No," followed the thunderous "Yes," that resounded in the Marriott Motor Hotel's main ballroom.

THE RESOLUTION

The resolution which attacks the federal guidelines requiring faculty integration of most Georgia schools this fall states:

"Whereas, the process of integration this current school year has been supported with amazing cooperation from most school systems in Georgia, and

"Whereas, the 1964 Democratic national platform declared, 'True democracy of opportunity will not be served by establishing quotas based on the same false distinctions we seek to erase, nor can the effects of prejudice be neutralized by the expedient of preferential practices,' and

RESTRICTS FREEDOM

"Whereas, the recent federal guidelines do require forced integration of faculties in a manner that sets established quotas and also eliminates or sharply restricts freedom of choice on the part of teachers, and

"Whereas, these same federal guidelines will tend to destroy much of the good will that now exists between school boards, school administrators, and classroom teachers, and

"Whereas, the democratic process of our nation is founded upon freedom of choice—to choose our vocations, to choose our avocations, to choose our places of residence, to choose the political party to which we belong, and to choose the candidate whom we would support, and

"Whereas, it appears that teachers who have themselves been denied the democratic process of freedom of choice will not likely be the most apt teachers of the democratic process, and

"Whereas, this denial will tend to destroy the democratic process itself, and

"Whereas, these new federal guidelines are being arbitrarily imposed by the same Democratic party that approved the Democratic National Party Platform in 1964,

"Therefore, be it resolved: that the federal government, which is presently controlled by this same Democratic party, return to its own national platform for its position and for its approach to a solution of this national problem, and

"Be it further resolved: that this position of Georgia teachers be made known to our Georgia senators and representatives."

The delegates representing the GEA's 29,000 members also adopted a resolution stating that it has not yet endorsed any candidate for any public office.

President-elect Clyde Kimball said the board of directors had agreed Wednesday to destroy without examining political opinion poll cards returned by the membership.

Also adopted by the delegates, whose four-day convention ends Saturday, were resolutions endorsing the teachers' salary raises adopted by the State Board of Education Wednesday and state-supported kindergartens.

The various departments of the GEA Friday elected the following officers:

Georgia Speech Association: president, Dr. Faye Head of Athens; first vice president, Mrs. Daphne Yvars of DeKalb College; second vice president, Dr. Richard Rea of Athens; third vice president, Mrs. Aileen Braley of Tucker; secretary-treasurer, Miss Roberta Winter of Agnes Scott College.

Georgia Mathematics Council: president, Mrs. Gwen Shufelt of Alpharetta; vice president, Leo Arnold of Albany; second vice president, Mrs. Becky King of Doraville; third vice president, Miss Nelle Covington of Thomaston; secretary, Mrs. Aurelia Henson of Dunwoody; treasurer, Mrs. Ora Lee Gadell of Athens; Newsletter editor, Miss Sue Boren of Decatur.

Georgia Council of Teachers of English: president, Mrs. Jane Sepple of Jackson; vice president, Mrs. Jeanne Boring of Moultrie; secretary, Mrs. Virginia Daniel of Millen; treasurer, Mrs. Mary McCampbell of Marietta; liaison, James Hale of Atlanta.

Meeting Scheduled On Desegregation

AC 3/20/66

Journal-Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, March 19—A conference on school desegregation will be held in Atlanta May 14 under the sponsorship of the Georgia Advisory Committee to the U.S. Civil Rights Commission.

It is one of nine such meetings scheduled in Southern states beginning March 26, according to a commission announcement here. The U.S. Office of Education will provide technical assistance at the meetings.

William L. Taylor, commission staff director, said the aim of the conferences is to acquaint citizens with federal laws and policies about school desegregation.

The new 1966-67 guidelines of the Office of Education will get particular attention. There also will be discussions of problems and techniques of desegregation and financial grants and other services available from the federal government and private agencies.

Invited to the Atlanta meeting will be local and state school officials, Negro and white teachers, parents, representatives of local and state civil rights organizations, officials, mayors, county commissioners and officials of public and private community and human relations organizations.

There will be workshops and problem clinics at the one-day meeting. The Office of Education will conduct the problem clinics, which will be restricted to problems presented by county, city or community delegations.

GEA Head Seeks Ease On Guidelines

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 3/20/66

By TOM GREENE

The centennial year president of the Georgia Education Association has pledged to seek "some modification at least" of new federal desegregation guidelines, but admonished teachers to be prepared to move forward regardless of the outcome.

Clyde W. Kimball Jr., who Saturday became the first Atlantan to be president of the GEA in 38 years, cited a resolution passed by delegates during the organization's 99th annual convention which sharply criticized the new guidelines and said:

"I will do all I can to help get some type of solution that we can live with."

But he warned the teachers that "you are responsible for what is going to happen in education this year, and I urge you that our first and foremost responsibility is to the boys and girls" in school.

"THERE IS work to be done even if we can't always have things the way that we want them," Mr. Kimball said.

The new GEA president is principal of Continental Colony School in Atlanta. After being sworn in at the President's Breakfast which concluded the convention at the Marriott Motor Hotel Saturday, he urged teachers to adopt Robert E. Lee as their "symbol of courage."

He reminded them that General Lee "after he lost the battle of his cause" was "as great a leader to the people of the Southland after the war as he was before the war."

Mr. Kimball also urged Georgia teachers to work to decrease school dropouts, adopting a goal of each teacher preventing at least one child from leaving school prematurely.

Dr. Zach Henderson, president of Georgia Southern College in Statesboro and outgoing GEA president, told the teachers he was proud of the fact that they had overwhelmingly voted to remove the color barrier from membership requirements — a goal for which he worked all year.

"IT'S HARD to speak the truth, but it's there" and you have to face it, Dr. Henderson said, adding:

"If GEA has a place in the state, it must be in the middle of trouble. The only way we can succeed . . . is to walk right up to the problems and roll up our sleeves and go at it.

"We must take the problems that are ours and make out of them workable solutions for this day."

GEA delegates voted heavily Friday to remove color restrictions from membership requirements in their constituion, but that does not mean that there will be instant integration in the century-old organization of almost 30,000 members.

New members join the organization through local units, and there likely will be a few Negro members by next year's 100th convention. But Negro teachers have their own organization, the Georgia Teachers Education Association (GTEA) with about 9,000 members and representatives of both groups say a merger of the two is unlikely anytime soon.

Dr. Howard Tate, GTEA executive director, who congratulated the GEA for "doing in 1966 what it should have done in 1867," said there would have to be joint committee meetings before any consolidation comes.

A. J. STRICKLAND, superintendent of the Trion City Schools for 18 years and a native of Blackshear, was named president-elect during the convention. He will become president in 1967.

New directors elected were Mrs. Jewel Palmer of Marietta, seventh district; E. J. Harrell of Hawkinsville, third district; D. D. Morrison of Pelham, second district, and A. D. Clifton of Metter, elected to fill an unexpired term to which he had been appointed.

Mrs. Hazel Lewis of Columbus was elected a trustee and Mrs. Isabel Kinnett of Macon was appointed treasurer, replacing Mrs. Pearl Tedder of Columbus, who had held the job for 20 years.

Dr. Henderson was nominated by the delegates to serve as the state's director in the National Education Association. He will have to be elected at the NEA convention this summer in Miami.

Guidelines 'a Mockery,' Talmadge Tells Senate

SCHOOL DESEG. - AJ 3/29/66

Says New Rules Curb Freedom of Association

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, March 29—Sen. Herman E. Talmadge charged Tuesday that new school desegregation guidelines "make a mockery of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association."

In remarks prepared for delivery in the Senate, the Georgia Democrat said the rules recently issued by the U.S. Office of Education "make requirements of school systems that not even the Supreme Court has seen fit to make."

Sen. Talmadge

"They call for the herding and busing of students from one school to another on the basis of arbitrary percentages, the juggling of school attendance zones and school bus routes to suit the whims of some bureaucrat in Washington, the mandatory transfer of teachers from one school to another and the requirement for such a mountain of paper work that teachers will be turned into bookkeepers and have little time left for the education of children," Sen. Talmadge said.

THE GUIDELINES, effective this fall, require a stepup in the percentage of student desegregation, substantial progress toward faculty desegregation and a shutdown of small Negro schools, among other things.

Sen. Talmadge said there is no legal obligation on any school system "to take action to achieve any degree of racial balance, not in Washington D. C., not in New York City and not in Georgia."

"Now comes the Office of Education demanding what the law nowhere requires or even contemplates," he said. "The imperative word 'must' appears no less than 92 times in these regulations."

The senator said Georgians view the 1954 school desegregation decision and the federal funds withholding section of the 1964 civil rights act as "an accomplished fact."

"I join the people of Georgia in support of all the constitutional rights of all citizens, regardless of race, creed or color," he said.

"But one of the most cherished of these rights is freedom from regimentation and enforced togetherness, which thankfully is forbidden by the Constitution," Sen. Talmadge said.

He did not cite the provision of the Constitution to which he was referring.

Sen. Talmadge said he hopes "these high-handed tactics will be abandoned." He said the office of enducation should obey the law.

Solons, Schoolmen To Discuss Rules

Georgia school officials will meet with the state congressional delegation in Washington Wednesday for a conference on the new U.S. Office of Education desegregation guidelines.

The delegation, a steering committee of school superintendents and school board members, is trying to gain a delay in implementation and moderation of the "shockingly hasty" order.

The guidelines laid down early this month call for stepped up school desegregation, "some" faculty desegregation and closing of small, inadequate Negro schools.

THE STEERING committee has said that this "terrific acceleration of desegregation procedures is altogether unfair and will militate against orderly desegregation processes progressively under way."

The committee has urged local school boards to let their individual congressmen know their feelings on the guidelines. It also is asking Georgia Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton to look into the legalities.

W. L. Robinson, president of the Fulton County Board of Education, and M. S. McDonald, superintendent of Rome schools, are cochairmen of the committee and will lead the delegation to Washington.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Which Is the Mockery?

It's interesting that Sen. Herman Talmadge should use the word "mockery" in referring to the U.S. Office of Education school desegregation guidelines.

The senator says these guidelines "make a mockery of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association."

The U.S. Supreme Court has used the word in connection with school segregation, too. In a case rising from the Little Rock crisis, the high court quoted the great Chief Justice John Marshall about an earlier state effort to evade federal law.

If states may "at will annul the judgments of the courts of the United States, and destroy the rights acquired under those judgments, the Constitution itself becomes a solemn mockery," Mr. Marshall wrote.

And that is precisely the point in the case of the Office of Education rules. It is now almost 12 years since the Supreme Court ruled that segregation denies Negroes equal protection guaranteed by the 14th Amendment.

Eight years ago, it was even more specific: ". . . only a prompt start, diligently and earnestly pursued, to eliminate racial segregation from the public schools (can) constitute good faith compliance. State authorities thus were duty bound to devote every effort toward initiating desegregation and bringing about the elimination of racial discriminaton in the public school system."

Yet the dual school system still is maintained throughout the South. Most desegregation is token. And most school districts did not embrace even tokenism until this school year, under pressure of Office of Education rules authorized by the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The obligation to eliminate the dual system would exist by virtue of the 1954 decision even if the Office of Education were not involved.

But the Civil Rights Act places an obligation on the Office of Education to withhold federal funds from school districts practicing discrimination. To avoid being totally arbitrary, OE had to establish some minimum standards for judging compliance. In the first year, it was extremely lenient so as to make the transition easier.

It was understood then that requirements would be strengthened this year, and they have been. They are not so demanding as Sen. Talmadge paints them, but they do require a higher percentage of pupil desegregation and progress toward faculty desegregation.

Sen. Talmadge says he now accepts the 1954 decision and the Civil Rights Act as accomplished facts. But he and other members of the Georgia congressional delegation feel somehow bound to protest the guidelines and seek modification. If they fail—and they will—they should feel an equal duty to explain to the people of Georgia that these rules, too, are accomplished facts.

Guidelines Fight Led by Talmadge

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Georgia lawmakers and education officials Tuesday began mounting a major campaign in Washington seeking to soften new federal guidelines for school desegregation in the South.

Sen. Herman Talmadge led a round of speech-making in the Senate during which Southerners accused the U.S. Office of Education of going beyond the provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act in issuing the guidelines.

Talmadge declared the regulations "amount to nothing less than a federal blackjack to force school officials to take actions never required by the Supreme Court or any federal statute. The Commissioner of Education claims Title VI (of the Civil Rights Act) for his authority, but the fact is these regulations exceed the scope and intent of the law to a shocking degree."

CALLED TYRANNICAL

Sen. Richard B. Russell called the guidelines the most "unjustified and tyrannical use of federal power" by government bureaucrats.

Russell, who led the fight against the 1964 Civil Rights Act, said proponents of the legislation "told us no quota system was involved. We are now told that freedom of choice means nothing."

Senators who supported the school legislation were warned by Russell that their actions would "come home to roost" if a fair housing bill proposed by President Lyndon B. Johnson is made law.

FUND CUT-OFF

He said "these fanatics and do-gooders" will be demanding that all federal funds be cut off from communities or cities if each residential block does not have a certain racial balance.

Ninth District Rep. Phil Landrum, an experienced congressional hand in educational affairs, said he has been conferring daily with top officials in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare about the guidelines, and he detects concern by some of them that the regulations "may go beyond what was intended" by law.

Landrum told HEW Secretary John W. Gardiner in a letter Tuesday, "It occurs to me that a more prudent course for your department to follow in administering these laws would be to withhold the application of these drastic guidelines and give the local people conversant with the local problem an opportunity to work these problems out under the freedom of choice plan and, thereby, afford a more wholesome learning environment."

At the request of Fulton County School Supt. Paul D. West, Atlanta Rep. Charles L. Weltner has set up a meeting at 11 a.m. Wednesday in Washington for Georgia education officials, the state's congressional delegation, and a representative of the Office of Education.

WAYS TO ALTER

Purpose of the conference is to discuss ways to alter the federal regulations for the coming school year. Georgia lawmakers in Washington have indicated an eagerness to participate in the meeting. This is a striking contrast to their attitude toward a governor's conference called by Gov. Carl Sanders in Washington last year to protest the first set of federal guidelines.

Commissioner of Education Harold Howe and David S. Seeley, head of the compliance division of the Office of Education, have agreed to meet with the Georgians.

Besides West, the Georgia educators include State School Supt. Jack Nix, Fulton County School Board president W. L. Robinson, Rome Supt. M. S. McDonald, Gainesville Supt. R. D. Blakney, Thomas County Supt. E. R. Cone and Jack Acree of the Georgia School Board Association.

Both Reps. James A. Mackay of Decatur and John Davis of Summerville have criticized the guidelines as being too severe.

The key argument by the Georgians, who are making the biggest effort to change the guidelines, hinges on the use of the word "desegregation" in the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Sen. Talmadge, in his speech, expressed the delegation's sentiment by saying, "The term desegregation is specifically defined as not meaning the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance."

QUOTA SYSTEM

The lawmakers contend that restrictions on the use of freedom of choice plans, the most widely used method of desegregation in the South, and fixing of percentages of Negroes in formerly all-white schools constitute a quota system.

If followed to the letter, the guidelines would require Georgia to more than triple its percentage of desegregation next year and would require integrated faculties in every school.

Sen. Talmadge told the Senate that the people of Georgia acknowledge the Supreme Court's 1954 desegregation decision and the 1964 Civil Rights Act as "accomplished fact."

Talmadge continued, "I join the people of Georgia in support of all the constitutional rights of all citizens, regardless of race, creed or color. But one of the most cherished of these rights is freedom from regimentation and enforced togetherness, which thankfully is forbidden by our Constitution. . . .

"It is my hope that these high-handed tactics will be abandoned. I am alert to the problems involving the great social changes now sweeping Georgia and other states of the South, and because of these problems and the earnest efforts of the people to resolve them, I say that reason and common sense must be allowed to prevail above all.

"The school system of Georgia pledged to obey the law and demonstrated good faith in doing so. The Office of Education should do the same."

Race, Labor Split S.C. Democrats

AC 3/31/66

COLUMBIA, S.C., (AP)—South Carolina's old guard Democratic leadership took a bitter beating Wednesday in a state party convention that included a demand for recognition of Negro voting strength and passage of a compulsory school attendance resolution with racial overtones.

The five-hour session ended in confusion with less than half of the more than 1,000 delegates present and with those who had remained in their seats shouting down state Sen. L. Marion Gressette of Calhoun, chairman of the state's long-standing segregation committee.

Also passed in the final minutes was a resolution proposed by Negro delegate A. W. Homan of Aiken. It put the convention on record as noting "incidents of racial discrimination" at party precinct meetings and directing "strict adherence" to non-discrimination guidelines set forth in the state party's platform.

John Bolt Culberston, a white Greenville attorney and longtime civil rights spokesman, had warned the convention earlier that Negroes and the labor vote would not tolerate "some of these faint-hearted Democratic candidates . . . who don't believe in giving Negroes the vote or labor a voice."

Culbertson, who ran unsuccessfully for Congress last year, vowed that he would run in the June 14 party primary for the nomination to one of the state's two U. S. Senate seats unless the announced candidates pledged to vote for civil rights legislation and elimination of state right-to-work laws.

He was cheered by all of the more than 200 Negro delegates and applauded by a good many of the white delegates.

SCHOOL DESEG

Guideline Change Won by Georgians

AC 3/31/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—A group of Georgia congressmen and educators came away from a day-long meeting with federal education officials Wednesday feeling they had won one major concession and had made inroads to others.

The clear-cut concession was a statement by Commissioner of Education Harold Howe that the new federal desegregation guidelines would not require integrated faculties in every school beginning this fall.

Officials of the U.S. Office of Education had said previously in Washington and in Georgia that the guidelines would require racially mixed faculties in each school.

Fulton County Supt. Paul West, who served as moderator of the meeting, announced afterward that "the commissioner said to me privately, 'I see this is a Donnybrook and I want you to get me a committee of three and come see me next week.' "

The sharpest comment during the meeting came from normally reserved Rep. Phil Landrum of Jasper.

Landrum's fired up statement came as David S. Seeley, head of the Office of Education's civil rights division, talked of the differences of opinions toward desegregation held by the Georgians and federal officials.

Landrum snapped, "We didn't come here to express our feelings or for you to express your feelings.

"What we are here to tell you as courteously and forcefully as we can, we tried to the limits of our abilities (to comply with regulations last year).

"We did not expect the stringent guidelines this year. We have not moved as fast as you wanted us to. But we moved.

"Why in God's name do you want to throw up a barrier to this progress? What you have said is that you are going to wreck the school system in a state that has tried harder than any other state, and bless you, you have had more support—political support—from Georgia than any of the states except those not concerned with this problem.

"What we want to do is to run a school system. We can run a system under freedom of choice. We can't under your guidelines."

Restrictions on freedom of choice desegregation plans was one of the most protested provisions of the new guidelines.

Commissioner Howe said the federal government believes that dual school systems continue to exist without legal support but he thinks the guidelines still permit a degree of gradualism and some freedom of choice.

"This process seems to me a continuation of free choice with the stipulation that the plans produce a desegregation," said Howe.

He said the Office of Education will not arbitrarily cut off school funds. He said systems which do not comply will be consulted by federal officials in hopes of working out acceptable plans through negotiation.

SEES TROUBLE

Howe said his office recognizes that integration of faculties would be difficult in the South and for that reason revised the original draft of the new guidelines so they would not require desegregation of all teaching staffs.

"I think it would be difficult to say exactly what faculty desegregation would be required," said the commissioner.

The congressmen and Georgia education officials were unable to pin down specific answers to hypothetical questions put to the federal officials about the guidelines.

GO TOO FAR

This factor, and others, indicated to some of the congressmen that the federal officials are concerned that they went beyond provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and court decisions in drawing the guidelines.

Other Georgia educators attending the meeting included State School Supt. Jack Nix, Gainesville Supt. Revis Blakeney, Fulton County School Board President W. L. Robinson, Rome Supt. M. S. McDonald, Thomas County Supt. E. R. Cone, candler County Supt. A. D. Clifton and Jack Acree, executive secretary of the Georgia School Board Association.

MINNEAPOLIS (UPI) — Sex education of children "at every age level from infancy to young adulthood" has been undertaken by The American Lutheran Church, which now is preparing publication of materials for the program.

Dr. C. Richard Evenson, ALC director of parish education, said "the church is accepting responsibility for sex education in response to a need which public schools usually are not permitted to treat adequately."

Negro Group Asks Guideline Hearing

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

By TOM GREENE

The Georgia Teachers and Education Association, currently holding its 48th annual convention in Atlanta, has asked the U.S. education commissioner for an audience on new desegregation guidelines.

Officials of the Negro professional organization have written Commissioner Harold Howe pointing out that they represent about a third of Georgia's teaching profession.

The letter, which requests a conference next week, said the GTEA was not represented in a group of Georgians which earlier this week conferred with the state's congressional delegation and education officials on the controversial guidelines.

That group representing school superintendents and school board members, is seeking delay in implementation and moderation of the new guidelines which call for stepped up desegregation and some staff integration.

THE GTEA LETTER to Commissioner Howe said, "Certainly those persons who appeared in your presence do not express the philosophy of our members and the thousands of others whom we represent.

"We feel that any audience entertained by the United States Office of Education in discussing matters as urgent and significant as the new guidelines on desegregation should be representative of all the people."

The GTEA convention, which has attracted some 5,000 delagates, was scheduled to conclude Friday night after a speech by Francis Keppel, assistant secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

Gov. Sanders Thursday told the delagates that Georgians are "determined to eradicate" barriers which "have lurked as spectres of limitation and of internal weakness." But he warned the battle "probably will not be fully won in our lifetime."

These barriers, the governor said, "perhaps have caused more civil strife and social unrest than any other factors in human history, including such ancient temptations as avarice and power-seeking."

THE GOVERNOR said that education will be the key to the problem.

State School Supt. Jack Nix Thursday night told the teachers that some college graduates entering the teaching profession are going to work for less money than most graduates of vocational schools.

"How can we encourage our sons or daughters to enter the teaching profession with a salary like that?" he asked.

But the superintendent said teacher salaries and education in Georgia are improving and will continue to do so.

Bolton Urged: Eye Guidelines For Possible Court Challenge

Atlanta Journal Washington Bureau
National Press Building

WASHINGTON, April 1 — A South Georgia congressman has asked Georgia's attorney general to study the new federal school desegregation guidelines with a view to challenging them in court.

Rep. Maston O'Neal of Bainbridge wrote Atty. Gen. Arthur K. Bolton that in his opinion "bureaucrats in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare have far exceeded their legal bounds."

The 2nd District Democrat said the guidelines "in effect hold the threat of withdrawal of federal funds over the heads of Georgia school boards to force them to commit illegal acts against the constitutional rights of Georgia parents and children, both white and Negro."

Rep. O'Neal said that the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision "did not require integration or the correction of racial imbalance."

As he sees it, the court "did forbid the use of segregation practices by the school authorities."

Desegregation plans giving pupils freedom of choice in the schools they attend resulted, he said, but now the U.S. Office of Education, a HEW agency, is "abandoning 'free choice' and proceeding to percentage requirements."

REP. O'NEAL said both Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, then a senator, and Chairman Emanuel Celler, D-N.Y., assured Congress in debate on the 1964 civil rights bill that the measure was not authorizing federal officials to work toward achieving racial balance in schools.

The Georgia congressman also wrote Rep. Celler asking him if what he said along that line in the House in 1964 still holds true.

Sen. Herman E. Talmadge, D-Ga., Rep. Phil M. Landrum of Jasper and numerous other Georgians and other Southerners in Congress have questioned the legality of the guidelines.

U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe told a meeting of Georgia schoolmen and congressmen Wednesday that the percentage standards are meant to call attention of his office to situations needing attention and are not intended as a means of overcoming racial imbalance.

The 1964 Civil Rights Act in defining desegregation says that it does not mean assignment of pupils to schools to overcome racial imbalance.

Howe, 5 Georgians To Talk Guidelines

AJ 4/1/66 SCHOOL DESEG

A committee of five Georgia school officials will meet with Harold Howe, U.S. commissioner of Education, in Washington Tuesday to continue their appeal for flexibility in the application of recently announced desegregation guidelines.

The conference is an outgrowth of a meeting with federal officials Wednesday which ended with Mr. Howe suggesting that a smaller committee meet with him later. The Wednesday meeting was attended by a committee of educators and the members of the Georgia delegation in the House of Representatives.

Paul D. West, superintendent of Fulton County schools, said Friday that the smaller group would meet with Mr. Howe at 9 a.m. Tuesday.

Supt. West objected to charges from some quarters that the group was engaging in "political grandstanding" and "attempting to evade the desegregation guidelines.

"There is nothing about the work of this committtee," he said, "that is based upon the desire to evade the law. It is based upon a deep-seated professional goal of providing the best education for all our children."

THE CURRENT problem, he said, stems from the various interpretations given to the guidelines by federal officials. He said that most school officials are "quite willing" to accept guidelines. "We feel it is our professional responsibility to accept them," he said.

SUPT. WEST said the federal official who explained the guidelines at three meetings in Georgia in March put them forward as inflexible. "Absolutism was the keystone," he said.

After meeting with the commissioner of education, Supt. West said, "apparently he understands the complexity of this and is fully sympathetic for school systems and boards that are moving in a manner consistent with their commitments of a year ago."

He said that he expected Tuesday's meeting to result in an "expansion" of Mr. Howe's statements "of flexibility and the thesis that all school systems in the nation can't be classified as the same in composition and administration."

Those scheduled to attend the Tuesday meeting are Supt. West, Claude Bray of Manchester, president of the Georgia School Boards Association, M. S. McDonald of Rome and W. L. Robinson, president of the Fulton County school board.

Baker First in U.S. to Lose School Aid After Filing Plan

AC 4/1/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Office of Education, in the first action of its kind, Thursday moved to cut off federal funds to Baker County, Ga., for failing to live up to a desegregation plan approved last year.

U.S. funds have been withheld from 79 Southern school systems which did not file desegregation plans, but this is the first time the Office of Education has accused a district of violating a federally-approved plan.

Although no official announcement has been made, The Constitution learned that the Office of Education on Thursday afternoon mailed special delivery instructions to State School Superintendent Jack Nix, saying that no new federal funds were allocated to Baker County.

Federal education officials also ordered Baker County to show cause why funds should not be terminated.

Baker County filed a desegregation plan last year that allowed freedom of choice in school attendance. The plan was approved and Baker had received U.S. financial allocations until Thursday.

It was reported that 165 Negroes filed applications for transfer last fall to all-white schools in Baker County. Only seven Negroes were transferred to white schools.

Civil rights organizations complained to the Office of Education, which twice sent teams of investigators to Baker to determine if the county was following its desegregation plan.

Investigators judged Baker County to be cheating on its desegregation agreement, and negotiations failed to change operations of the school system, according to sources in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Baker County is reported to

be one of seven school districts in the South investigated by the Office of Education compliance staff since last September.

The compliance division is being doubled this year and school systems can expect closer surveilance of desegregation plans, Commissioner of Education Harold Howe has said.

Baker County will continue to receive funds already obligated by federal agencies, but the flow of U.S. money for new projects was cut off by Thursday's action.

The show cause hearing will be held before a federal examiner to determine if there is justification for the action against Baker County.

In another development Thursday, a federal examiner recommended that funds be terminated for Glascock County, Ga.

The Office of Education under administrative procedures began deferring last June 30 federal funds allocated to Glascock, Toombs, Lincoln and Taliaferro Counties.

None of the four Georgia counties have submitted plans acceptable to federal officials. Show cause hearings on termination of funds were held last November for Glascock, Toombs and Lincoln Counties.

A federal examiner recommended on Feb. 25 that funds be terminated for Toombs County. Before the examiner returned a recommendation for Lincoln, the county on Feb. 17 filed a plan approved by the Office of Education.

Procedures to terminate funds for Taliaferro have not been started since the county is the defendant in a U.S. court desegregation suit filed by civil rights groups and joined by the Justice department.

Before termination of funds can become final for Glascock, Toombs or Baker Counties recommendations by examiners must be affirmed by commissioner Howe; John Gardner, secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and Congressmen be notified officially.

Meanwhile, Rep. Maston O'Neal of Bainbridge, Ga., requested Georgia Attorney General Arthur Bolton to seek a court test of new desegregation guidelines.

In a letter to Attorney General Bolton, Rep. O'Neal said he believed the commissioner of education in drawing the new guidelines had assumed authority not granted by the 1964 Civil Rights Act or by court decisions.

"In my opinion," said O'Neal, "the only recourse for Georgia schools to cope with this illegal action is to obtain judicial review."

He asked Bolton to "search out the avenues of approach to this problem."

Other members of the Georgia congressional delegation continued to work behind the scenes for a wider interpretation of the new guidelines.

U.S. Takes Step to Halt Funds To a School District in Georgia

4/2/64 SCHOOL DESEG.

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 1—After six months of delay, the Office of Education has made its first move to cut off funds from a school district accused of failing to live up to its desegregation pledge.

Notice was mailed last night to officials in Baker County, in Georgia that the matter is subject to a formal hearing, the first step in cutting off Federal assistance as provided under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The office wanted this move interpreted as an indication that it would get tough with other districts that fail to live up to desegregation promises, a spokesman said.

Cut-off hearings have been held or are scheduled for about 80 districts in the South. But all of these either made no attempt to qualify for Federal assistance or submitted desegregation plans that were unacceptable.

Baker County was one of many that submitted plans that met Government standards but then were accused by Negro groups of violating the agreements. A team assigned to investigate the Baker County situation last September said it had found flagrant violation of the plan and recommended immediate cut-off of funds.

Rights Leaders Complained

Three months later when civil rights leaders complained of the district continuing to receive funds, a spokesman for the office said:

"We believe that sufficient evidence of substantial noncompliance exists and are coordinating with the Justice Department whether we will pursue the matter through the courts or through administrative proceedings."

There was no further report until last night, when Georgia's Congressional delegation was informed that the hearing notice had been mailed.

Baker County, in rural southeast Georgia, has been a center of racial turmoil. About two-thirds of its 4,700 residents are Negro.

Last summer, the Baker County school board submitted a desegregation plan under which students would be permitted to choose which school they would attend.

According to a report of the investigation more than 160 Negro parents signed forms saying they wanted their children to attend former all-white schools. Of these about 40 were reassigned to Negro schools because their forms were incomplete or improperly filled out.

A number of others withdrew their requests to transfer. But of the remaining applications the board agreed to transfer only seven and reassigned the remainder to Negro schools.

Other Negroes Turned Back

On the day school opened the sheriff and a force of 25 State Troopers turned back all Negroes but the seven picked by the school board.

The report said that Baker County officials agreed they were not in compliance but maintained that Baker County as "such a hard nut to crack" that it would take Federal troops to keep order if more Negroes were enrolled. They said that acceptance of seven Negroes was an important breakthrough.

Because of the lengthy procedure prescribed for cutting off funds under Title VI, which bans racial discrimination in any program that receives Federal assistance, Baker County will continue receiving Federal funds for at least the remainder of this school year.

Of the 80 school districts cited for hearings, about 15 have come into compliance. The first hearings for the others were held last October. Examiners have returned decisions in 41 cases with recommendations that funds be cut off to all.

Their recommendations are now before the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. Before there can be any cutoff, however, the department must give Congress 30 days notice.

A School Memory

Memory takes me back to the old elementary Fourth District Grammar School at Chattanooga, Tennessee. Beginning with the fourth grade, there were in "our class" two Italian - American girls from obviously poor families. Their clothing was shabby. They sometimes brought no lunch to school. (This was before the coming of cafeterias.) I recall them in part because, to a boy but lately moved from a river bottom farm distant from the city, they were the two first foreign looking persons I had ever seen.

They have been on my conscience since those elementary school years. At recess they were apart. None of the several groups that formed "to play" ever took them in. I don't recall anyone speaking to them or they to anyone else. It was a cruel thing to do, but that's how it was.

I think of that — and similar experiences in school years — when I hear people say the civil rights laws and guidelines destroy freedom of association at school. They do not. Pupils still freely will choose their associates.

No Social Event

Going to school is not a social event. Nor is attendance in classes a social occasion. There is no social atmosphere in receiving instruction.

Play at recess is not a social affair. On the contrary, it invariably is the one time during school hours that free choice of association operates. Recess group-associations are like the groups that walk to and from school, or arrive and depart in car pools. They are freely made.

Play at recess is not a social affair. On the contrary, it invariably is the one time during school hours that free choice of association operates. Recess group-associations are like the groups that walk to and from school, or arrive and depart in car pools. They are freely made. Members of them may lock themselves in and avoid broader experiences, or not.

One of the great myths is that education is somehow a social event. This attitude is found chiefly in areas where the school is also the community club house. In such areas, dances, community parties, and other noneducational events take place at the school house. But these are not a part of the education. They have nothing to do with the curriculum.

Such events are not without their educational impacts. The processes of learning are all about us. Most of our "learning" does not come from school. The extra-curricular activities often are events that teach false values and create smug status groups and attitudes.

Educational guidelines, as announced by the U.S. Department of Education, will be difficult only in those communities which pre-judge them on the basis of false information, unreasonable fears, or pressures of local prejudices.

Honest Appraisal

The guidelines deserve honest appraisal, based on a careful examination of local conditions. There will be real difficulty only where the climate is one of determination to resist — rather than to try in good faith. School administrators should be allowed to hold community meetings to prepare for accepting the guidelines free from interference. If, in 1954, school administrators had been allowed to work out, with deliberate speed, the court's orders, we would not have had the great disorders encouraged and initiated by some of the governors of our region — and by lesser political leaders — who said "never" and who created violence.

Surely, after 10 years of varying turmoil, we now know that the fears of 1954 were unjustified. We can hardly have failed to learn that in several states the leadership of that time badly let its people down. It must now be apparent that it is necessary to give all our children the best possible education. There isn't any other path to take except that—to give each child the best opportunity to have the best education his state can give him.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Integration Guidelines Not Too Harsh, Nix Finds

AC 4/6/66

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Georgia Schools Superintendent Jack Nix said Tuesday he believes the new federal desegregation guidelines will be easier to "live with" than state educators thought a the outset.

Nix, who headed a committee of Georgia school officials at a conference with U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe, said federal officials made it clear, however, that school districts must make "substantial progress" in desegregation next fall to qualify for federal funds.

This was the second meeting in Washington within a week between Howe and Georgians to discuss the new guidelines. None of the Georgia congressional delegation participated in Tuesday's private session with Howe.

Nix said Howe informed the committee that methods of accomplishing "substantial progress" are open to interpretations and will be measured according to circumstances in individual school districts.

The state superintendent said all new federal funds will be

Guidelines' Threat To Funds Held Less

withheld from all Southern school districts which do not sign by April 15 an agreement to comply with the guidelines.

Nix said only "15 or 20" of Georgia's 196 school districts have signed the agreement so far.

"There will be many that won't sign by the deadline," said Nix. "The failure to sign 441-B (the compliance form) would be an act of non-compliance."

The Office of Education under administrative procedures holds up obligations of new federal funds to school systems ruled out of compliance with its desegregation guidelines.

The Georgians said they were given the impression that freedom of choice desegregation plans formed under the initial guidelines issued in 1965 would be allowed to continue if they showed "progress" toward elimination of dual school systems and if the compliance form is signed.

WEST'S FINDINGS

Dr. Paul West, Fulton County superintendent, said, "We found out that we don't have to meet the percentages as long as a system makes solid progress."

He said Howe told the committee that the figures contained in the guidelines will be used to pinpoint school districts with low percentages of Negroes in classrooms with white students.

A low percentage of integration will not be reason to cut off funds automatically, the Georgians said they were told.

The committee reported they were assured that any system which signs a compliance form will not have federal money cut off without the Office of Education making an effort to negotiate with local officials.

COMPENSATORY FACTORS

Dr. West said the Georgians were informed that "compensatory" factors would be taken into consideration in individual desegregation plans.

West said, for instance, systems with a large percentage of student desegregation might be credited with progress even though faculty desegregation in the district would be less than anticipated by the Office of Education.

Rome Superintendent M. S. McDonald said after the meeting with Howe, "We all ended up with the feeling that they will be reasonable in helping us to work it out."

SEE LIAISON

Nix said he is convinced that both the Georgia and federal education officials are concerned with the best course of action for education.

"At no time have I said not to obey the law," said Nix, acknowledging that the aim of the federal government is to eliminate dual school systems in the South.

"There might be 196 stages in Georgia" for moving toward that objective, said Nix.

Other Georgians meeting with Howe on Tuesday were Jack Acree, executive secretary of the Georgia School Board Association and W. L. Robinson, president of the Fulton County School Board.

Cutoff of Funds Looms; Flexibility Stirs Hope

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, April 6—Georgia school districts Wednesday had just 10 days to fall in line with new federal desegregation guidelines or face a cutoff of federal funds for new activities.

State Supt. Jack Nix and a committee of school administrators who held a second conference with U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe found out Tuesday that:

1. The April 15 deadline for signing compliance assurances (form 441B) remains intact.

2. The guidelines issued last month remain intact, too.

About 175 of Georgia's 196 school districts still must act on the new guidelines. New desegregation plans are not required, however, for systems which already have them, and all except three Georgia districts do.

The Georgia schoolmen came away from their closed meeting with Mr. Howe Tuesday apparently more optimistic that enforcement of the guidelines will be more flexible than Stanley Kruger, southeastern equal education officer for the U.S. Office of Education, had led them to believe.

HERE IS WHAT the guidelines say about signing up to comply with the new guidelines:

" A school system with a voluntary desegregation plan must provide an assurance that it will abide by the applicable requirements for such plans contained in this statement of policies. Such assurance may be given by submitting HEW form 441B to the commissioners.

"After April 15, 1966, commitments of funds for new activities will be subject to deferral for school systems which have failed to submit HEW form 441B."

THE GUIDELINES also say:

"A school system with a desegregation plan accepted by the commissioner need not resubmit its plan if it intends to continue under the same type of plan.

"If a plan accepted by the commissioner fails to meet any requirement under this statement of policies, the submission of HEW form 441B will be deemed to amend the plan so that it will meet such requirement."

The term "voluntary desegregation plan" applies to all plans other than court-ordered ones such as a few Georgia systems, including Atlanta, are under.

Most of the school systems in Georgia are using the freedom of choice plan, which is one type of voluntary plan allowed by the Office of Education.

But the new guidelines mainly affect freedom of choice plans, and that has been one of the main reasons for consternation on the part of school officials in Georgia.

"The Georgia group, however, "came to the realization that there is reasonable flexibility" in application of the guidelines, Dr. Paul D. West of Atlanta, superintendent of Fulton County schools, said after the closed meeting with Commissioner Howe.

Only 10 Days More On Guidelines

Dr. West said that school systems showing "definite progress" in their efforts to meet the guidelines will get reasonable treatment from the Office of Education.

ANOTHER MEMBER of the Georgia group, W. L. Robinson of Atlanta, chairman of the Fulton School Board, said that school systems expecting to be able to continue with a freedom of choice plan or other programs of desegregation must sign the new compliance statement, according to what Mr. Howe said.

State Supt. Nix considered the meeting profitable. He said everyone there was interested in seeing that education in Georgia is not interrupted.

SCHOOL DESEG

Says School Guidelines Are Misunderstood — Seeks 'Reasonable' Progress

4/12/66

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 11 — John W. Gardner, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, assured Southern political and educational leaders today that his department was not trying to impose a formula of racial balance in schools or "instantaneous desegregation" of every teaching staff.

The assurance was contained in a letter sent to Governors, members of Congress and state school officials in response to growing opposition in the South to new school desegregation guidelines set by the Office of Education.

Although officials insisted that the action did not constitute softening of the guidelines or revision of policy, it was clearly an attempt to head off the possibility of a full-scale revolt by Southern school districts.

Doubled Integration Seen

Mr. Gardner said there had been widespread misinterpretation of the guidelines issued March 7 for the 1966-67 school year. He said the guidelines had been based on court decisions.

The guidelines were issued under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which make racial discrimination in any federally assisted program illegal. The Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, said in announcing the requirements that they could double the amount of school integration in 11 Southern states.

Since then a number of political and educational leaders in the South have charged that the guidelines go beyond the law and the latest Federal court decisions on school integration. Fewer that 300 of the 2,000 school districts asked to submit declarations of intent to comply with the guidelines have done so, although the deadline is April 15.

Paul Anthony, director of the Southern Regional Council, said that a "real effort is being made to force the Office of Education to back down from the new guideline."

Part of the new opposition in the South is said to stem from a belief that the Office of Education is about to press for more integration in the South than exists in other regions. There is no plan for moving against discrimination in Northern schools under Title VI for at least another year.

"The guidelines do not, as some have assumed, require the instantaneous desegregation of the faculty in every school building in every district," Mr. Gardner said in the letter.

"They provide considerable flexibility as to how a district might undertake faculty desegregation. What the guidelines do require is that a reasonable beginning be made and that reasonable progress be achieved beyond what was achieved last year."

Percentages as Guides

In response to criticism that the Government was trying to impose a percentage of "racial balance" in the schools, Mr. Gardner said the percentages had been written into the guidelines only as an "administrative guide" for measuring progress in integration under "free choice" plans, which most Southern districts have adopted.

Under free choice, students select their school instead of being assigned to them on a geographic basis. Civil rights groups have charged that misuse of freedom of choice last year thwarted integration in many areas.

The New York Times

REASSURES OFFICIALS: John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, wrote about guidelines in school integration.

The new guidelines say that in areas of heavy Negro population the Office of Education may expect the following under freedom of choice plans next year:

If the rate of transfer from segregated schools was 8 or 9 per cent last year the transfer rate should double next fall; if a smaller percentage of Negroes transferred, such as 4 per cent, then next fall's transfer rate should be tripled; and so on.

"In seeking appropriate criteria to guide us in review of free choice," Mr. Gardner said, "we have adopted the objective criteria applied by the courts in similar situations."

No court decision has established percentages of racial balance, but H.E.W. officials say several recent decisions carry the same effect.

"With more than 2,000 separate districts to consider," Mr. Gardner said, "such percentages are an administrative guide which helps us to determine those districts requiring further review. Such districts will determine whether or not the freedom of choice plan is in fact working fairly."

Mr. Gardner pointed out that the first guidelines issued in April, 1965, "were not widely questioned" and that all but about 30 districts had made an effort to comply in order to receive Federal funds.

The new guidelines, however, are much more stringent and many school officials in the South say they constitute the first real assault on the dual system.

Mr. Gardner said the changes had been made because during 1965 "the courts repeatedly announced requirements which put school districts further along the road toward desegregation."

Several Federal judges, however, have said that the new court decrees were following executive standards adopted by the Office of Education.

MENZIES TO TEACH IN VIRGINIA IN FALL

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — Sir Robert Menzies, former Prime Minister of Australia, has been named University Scholar in Residence for the fall semester at the University of Virginia. He was elected by the university's Board of Visitors meeting at Charlottesville, the Australian News and Information Bureau reports.

Sir Robert, who retired in January after a total of 18 years in the office, served more than twice as long as any previous Australian Prime Minister. While at the university, he will deliver a series of public lectures and will meet with student seminars, particularly in the School of Law and the Woodrow Wilson Department of Government and Foreign Affairs.

Sir Robert first served as Prime Minister from 1939 to 1941, when he resigned the office and leadership of the United Australia Party. Two years later he again became head of the party, which he reorganized into the Liberal Party and in 1949 began a 16-year tenure as Prime Minister.

Whites and Negroes Merge Clayton's Teacher Group

Clayton County's two professional teacher groups — one Negro, the other white—voted unanimously Tuesday to merge. They are the first in Georgia to do so.

"We have been working on the machinery of this for a full year," said Clayton County School Supt. J. E. Edmonds. "We're very pleased."

Despite the merger, the exact status of the new group is in doubt. The whites are members of the Georgia Education Association and the Negroes belong to the Georgia Teachers and Education Association.

"We were not surprised," said GEA Executive Director Frank M. Hughes. "We were expecting it." Hughes added, however, that local units only receive GE services for GEA members.

Hughes said he has no knowledge of other local groups planning similar moves. He said there is only one Negro teacher to every 10 white teachers in Clayton County.

Both the GEA and the GTEA are affiliates of the National Education Association and are under orders to prevent plans for merger at the national convention this summer.

So far no plans have been announced, but the GEA did agree last month to remove its "white only" membership qualification.

The GTEA has always accepted members regardless of race. The Clayton County Chapter of the GEA has 780 members. The GTEA has 70.

Edmonds has been appointed temporary chairman by the new group, which will elect officers April 20.

The GEA has about 26,000 members: the GTEA, about 12,000.

97 Million In U.S. Aid At Stake

By JOE BROWN

With $97 million at stake, and facing a Friday deadline, less than half of Georgia's school systems have said they will comply with new federal guidelines for school desegregation.

The guidelines, released in March, require desegregation of teaching staffs and increased integration of student bodies. As of Wednesday afternoon only 65 Georgia systems had agreed to comply, State Department of Education officials said.

195 SYSTEMS

Of the state's 195 systems, five that do not operate separate schools for Negroes and whites and seven now under federal court order to desegregate are not required to sign the compliance pledge.

The five, Gilmer, Forsyth, Dawson, Union and Towns, are classified as fully integrated, while those under court order must desegregate at the pace the court sets.

The remaining 183 systems, however, must submit certificates of compliance to the State Department of Education by Friday or stand in danger of losing all federal funds.

"It should be emphasized that both the original and the revised guidelines deal with those school districts submitting desegregation plans designed to eliminate a dual school system," says U.S. Commissioner of Education Howard Howe.

FUNDS FROM U.S.

The federal government is authorized to withhold funds from non-complying systems under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, he explains.

Desegregation Rules Resisted in 5 States

By Jack Nelson
Los Angeles Times

ATLANTA—Stiff resistance to the new school desegregation guidelines has developed in each of the five Southern states where more than 98 per cent of the Negro students still attend segregated schools.

The guidelines, announced last month by the U.S. Office of Education, have become a political target of both Democrats and Republicans and once again white Southerners are being told the Federal Government is trying illegally to force them to desegregate.

Hundreds of school systems so far have failed to sign pledges of compliance with the new regulations. U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe II said that all systems that have not filed the pledges by April 15 will be notified that under the 1964 Civil Rights Act they face loss of all Federal aid.

Modification Sought

In Alabama the local school superintendents, by a 76-to-4 vote, adopted a resolution urging their Congressmen to seek modification of the guidelines.

In Georgia, State School Superintendent Jack Nix reported that only about 20 of the state's 196 systems had filed the compliance forms.

Some of the same Dixie politicians who urged resistance to the 1954 Supreme Court school desegreation decision and called it illegal are now saying the new guidelines are illegal.

Despite the 1954 decision, scores of Federal court desegregation rulings and the 1964 Civil Rights Act, only .25 per cent of Alabama's negro pupils now attend desegregated schools. Other states where the percentage is less than 2 include Mississippi .34; Louisiana .68; Georgia 1.3 and South Carolina 1.5.

States Most Affected

The same five states have formed the hard-core opposition to all desegregation efforts of recent years. They are the states most affected by the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

Faculty desegregation requirements in the new guidelines are causing much of the opposition.

Many school officials also bitterly oppose a provision that outlaws "freedom of choice" plans if the plans fail to produce a satisfactory level of desegregation.

Such plans, approved by the 1965 guidelines, were adopted by most Southern schools. Hundreds of systems using the plans manage to remain completely segregated while continuing to qualify for Federal aid.

South Carolina Republican Party adopted a resolution opposing the guidelines and cheered a speech by Sen. Strom Thurmond denouncing the regulations as unreasonable and un-American.

Such statements by leading political figures have received wide play in the Southern press and strong endorsements from segregationist newspapers. They have promoted much stiffer resistance than U.S. education officials had originally expected.

Gardner Writes Lawmakers

[Health, Education and Welfare Secretary John W. Gardner, wrote Senators and Representatives from 15 Southern and border states this week, telling them that the guidelines go no further than the law allows and that school districts have considerable flexibility in meeting the guidelines.

[In addition, school officials from Mississippi, North Carolina and Florida will meet with Office of Education officials in Washington today and Friday to discuss the guidelines. Meetings with school officials from other states are scheduled in following weeks.]

Personnel Lacking

The question now is how far the Education Office can go—or is willing to go—to insure compliance.

The record of tokenism this year is attributable to two things: lack of sufficient personnel to determine which systems were living up to their school desegregation plans and admitted leniency in enforcing the 1965-66 guidelines.

There has been no indication that additional funds will be alloted for monitoring and enforcing compliance next fall.

The Education Office stuck closely to its announced policy of promoting voluntary compliance, rather than using the ultimate weapon of withdrawing Federal aid—so closely that civil rights leaders have complained and some Southern school officials have interpreted the policy as a lack of resolve.

To date no funds have been withdrawn from school systems that have defied the 1965-66 guidelines. But the time is close when a final decision may be made in a number of cases.

The new guidelines set up criteria for the Education Commissioner to review such plans to see whether they are in compliance. In essence, the criteria are based on the desegregation results of the current school year: the less accomplished, the more required next fall.

Regulations Described

The regulations say that if a significant percentage of students, such as 8 or 9 per cent, were transferred from segregated schools during the 1965-66 school year, at least twice that many transfers would be expected in the fall. And if the percentage were less, such as 4 per cent, then the Education Office would expect the percentage to be tripled.

Most of the opposition is in the Deep South, but scattered protests have been heard in other Southern states. For example, the Texas State Board of Education has expressed displeasure with the guidelines.

Gov. George Wallace told Alabama school officials that they "should not have to obey the edicts of bureaucratic officials which go beyond the law."

U.S. Sen. Richard Russell (D-Ga.), who led the unsuccessful fight in the Senate against the 1964 Civil Rights Act, called the guidelines an "unjustified and tyrannical use of Federal power."

Called Blackjack

His Georgia colleague, Sen. Herman Talmadge, labeled them "nothing less than a Federal blackjack to force school officials to take actions never required by the Supreme Court or any Federal statute."

At its recent convention the cheered a speech by Sen. Strom Thurmond denouncing the regulations as unreasonable and un-American.

Not Their Policy to Direct Local Action, President Says

By DIANE THOMAS

The Georgia Congress of Parents and Teachers will issue no directives regarding compliance with federal desegregation guidelines drawn up in March.

"We don't expect it to be a major issue," Mrs. Leland Bagwell, president of the Georgia PTA, said Wednesday.

AVOIDS LOCAL STAND

"The Georgia Congress of Parents and Teachers doesn't send down directives for action at the local level," she said. "But we are urging local PTA leaders to provide accurate information for members so that intelligent decisions can be made."

More than 600 Georgia PTA leaders gathered at the Atlanta Marriott Motor Hotel Wednesday for the 52nd annual convention of the Georgia Congress of Parents and Teachers. Mrs. Jenelle Moorhead, president of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, keynoted the three-day meeting.

The national PTA will undertake in the near future a program of "really tremendous scope" to recruit "hard to reach" parents in economically deprived areas for active membership in Parent-Teacher Associations, she said.

PILOT PLAN

"Even as I speak," she declared, "the Office of Economic Opportunity has before it a pilot project . . . to help reach the hard-to-reach parent."

Such a program, the University of Oregon educator said, could entail calling on the parents, organizing block meetings in the neighborhoods or the "adoption" of a less affluent PTA by another that is well established.

SUCCESSFUL PROJECTS

Successful pilot programs were carried out last year in sections of Los Angeles, Chicago, Akron, Ohio, and Washingotn, D.C., she reported.

The plan now before the OEO calls for establishment of "model programs" in 10 cities during the first year. The 10 cities have not yet been selected.

A 'Let George Do It' Policy

Governor George Wallace, in a strong state rights assertion, has said the Yellowhammer state will not accept the school guidelines as laid down by the U.S. Department of Education.

He will not, he said, allow the public school system of his state "destroyed in this fashion." In other words, one assumes, he will let George do it.

Governor Wallace, however, is entirely within his states rights. The public school system of Alabama can reject any and all federal school funds. The governor says it is the will of the state school people so to do. One may doubt the private unanimity of the school people. But one also would understand their refusal to oppose the governor's decision. (Readers should keep in mind that the governor's wife is a candidate for governor in the primary of this summer.)

It is not true, as the governor says, and must know, that the guidelines interfere with the "historic" right of academic freedom.

The Guidelines

The guidelines do not, in even a remote sense, interfere with academic freedom. The guidelines issue is simple. Federal funds may not be used in a discriminatory manner. Nor may they be spent to perpetuate what the Congress of the United States and the Courts of the country have outlawed — discrimination in employment. Governor Wallace says that he will obey the law, but will not go beyond it. The Congress has made it against the law to discriminate.

The U.S. Department of Education certainly cannot go beyond the law. It may not give federal funds to a state which

The guidelines do not, in even a remote sense, interfere with academic freedom. The guidelines issue is simple. Federal funds may not be used in a discriminatory manner. Nor may they be spent to perpetuate what the Congress of the United States and the Courts of the country have outlawed — discrimination in employment. Governor Wallace says that he will obey the law, but will not go beyond it. The Congress has made it against the law to discriminate.

The U.S. Department of Education certainly cannot go beyond the law. It may not give federal funds to a state which will, for example, continue to discriminate against equally qualified Negro teachers. There are some Southern states and-or communities which, despite acute shortages of teachers, are dismissing, or failing to rehire, the most experienced and qualified Negro teachers.

The Congress, in its legislation, has declared this to be unlawful. In time, there will be court tests on this issue. No public agency may use federal funds to discriminate. That is the one and only issue in the opposition to the educational guidelines.

So it simply is not true that the guidelines in any sense interfere with academic freedom. They do, and should, interfere with local boards using federal education funds in a discriminatory manner, including that of hiring teachers.

Federal Aid

It is helpful if we will keep the facts before us. Some Southern communities and leaders are attempting to depict federal aid to education as "interfering" with freedom of education. This is not true. It is the kind of propaganda that claims the U.S. Supreme Court banned the Bible and prayer from the public schools. There was, and is, no truth in that statement. The court said that public schools, which include Jews, Muslims, and members of other non-Christian religious sects, may not require compulsory prayer of Bible readings. No thoughtful person wishes prayer or Bible reading to be compulsory. We either have separation of church and state or we don't.

Governor Wallace may refuse federal aid for all his schools. Individual communities may do the same thing. The quality of education is low in Alabama, as it is in other states. Governor Wallace assists in further lowering this quality. But he and the principals would do well to know what they thereby do to innocent children. And they also must know that individual suits will be filed, in the months ahead, against the discrimination in employment they plan.

The spectacle of adults refusing to do all that can be done to give their children the best possible education is not a pleasant one. It is no coincidence that opposition to guidelines came from those who most need federal aid.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

72 School Systems at Aid Deadline

AC 4/15/66

Of 183 Georgia School systems required to pledge compliance to the new federal guidelines for school desegregation 111 had done so Thursday afternoon.

Systems not pledging compliance by Friday midnight stand in danger of losing all federal aid, authorities say.

"I'm rather optimistic," State School Superintendent Jack P. Nix said Thursday. "I have not had a superintendent say he or his board will defy the federal guidelines."

FEDERAL AID

"I think the state will lose very little federal money," he added. Last year Georgia schools received about $97 million in federal aid.

The guidelines, released by the U.S. Office of Education in March, require desegregation of teaching staffs this fall and further integregation of student bodies.

Of Georgia's 195 school systems, five that do not operate separate schools for Negroes and whites and seven now under federal court order to desegregate are not required to sign the compliance pledge.

COURT CALLS TUNE

The five, Gilmer, Forsyth, Dawson, Union and Towns are classified as fully integrated, while those under court order must desegregate at the pace the court sets.

Federal officials say that payment of funds to systems failing to file compliance pledges will be "immediately deferred."

During the 1965-66 school year only 1.3 per cent of Georgia's 320,000 Negro school children were in integrated classes.

EXPECTS INCREASE

Office of Education Regional Director Stan Kruger says he expects systems having some integration now to triple the amount this fall. Systems that now have no integregation are expected to have 10 per cent of their Negro enrollment in desegregated classes this fall.

Kruger says he hopes to see all teaching staffs integrated. Systems that do not meet these standards will be very carefully studied, he said.

"They must have reasons," said Kruger, "and be prepared to prove them."

Negroes Told City To Meet Guidelines

Acting Though Signing Isn't Required, Letson Is Quoted

By DICK HEBERT

Negroes said Thursday night that School Superintendent John Letson has promised them Atlanta will abide by federal desegregation guidelines for 1966 even though it doesn't have to sign a compliance pledge.

Atlanta's school system is one of seven in Georgia that does not have to sign the pledge because they are under court-ordered desegregation plans.

But Dr. Robert L. Green, education director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said the 1966 federal guidelines are more stringent than the current court order against Atlanta, and could result in stepped up desegregation.

CITY WILL COMPLY

Four Negro parents visited Letson Wednesday to discuss desegregation plans and were told then that the city will comply, one woman told an SCLC-sponsored meeting.

The new guidelines allow every student to submit an application to attend any school of his choice, but also allow the school officials to give priority assignments to those living nearest any given school.

Green met with Negroes to organize a committee to push for faster desegregation and for more consideration of needs at predominantly Negro schools.

He said he was concerned that the guidelines were described as "flexible" by the U.S. Commissioner of Education.

"Just how flexible are they?" he asked. He said that depends on the amount of pressure brought by Negroes against the school officials who apply the guidelines.

LACKING SCHOOLS

He said Negroes represent just short of half the school population in Atlanta but have only nine high schools and 42 elementary schools while whites have 15 high schools and 75 elementary.

"There are 11 Negro schools on double sessions but no white schools on double sessions," he said. Even Collier Heights School, held out as "a model school for Negroes," has almost double the enrollment it was built for, Green said.

In one Negro high school he said there aren't enough chairs for all the students enrolled—"a tacit assumption" that there will be a steady absentee rate of 10 per cent or more.

New schools proposed in the bond issue anticipated this year "will not facilitate desegregation," he said, because they are located deep in segregated neighborhoods.

HOUSING PROBLEM

And housing isn't getting desegregated, he said. One man commented, "They're trying to move all the Negroes to one side of town, the west side."

Green said, "Ninety-eight per cent of the public housing here is rigidly segregated" and only helps concentrate Negroes in certain areas, making desegregation of previously all-white schools that more difficult because the schools aren't where they can be reached by Negroes.

He indicated the committee being organized will shape up plans to organize local Parent-Teacher Associations, high school groups, civic clubs and others behind a drive for better treatment at the hands of school officials.

Augusta Negro to Get Helm As She and Pupils Integrate

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP)—A Negro principal said Friday that she expects her 52 pupils to transfer with her next September when she becomes principal of what is now an all-white elementary school.

The principal, Mrs. Annie Mae Williams, and the one other teacher at the two-room, five-grade fifth Ward school will be assigned to the Martha Lester school which now has 160 white pupils and eight white teachers.

The reassignments voted by the Richmond County school board Thursday night are part of a desegregation plan under new federal guidelines. The Fifth Ward school will be closed.

Pupils now attending the Negro school and those at the Lester school will be given their choice of about four schools, County Superintendent Roy E. Rollins said.

Rollins said he did not know what the racial makeup of the faculty at the Lester school will be next September.

But Mrs. Williams will be the principal. She said she expects the school to be integrated.

"It makes no difference," she said when asked in an interview how she felt about teaching white pupils for the first time in 33 years as a teacher.

"I've been here a long time," Mrs. Williams, 51, said.

"I'm no fuss-maker. I think that's the reason they wanted me to take it. I have not brought any agitation."

She said she never thought when she began her classroom career that she would teach white children. "But I've always got along," she said.

The Lester school has seven grades and better facilities, Mrs. Williams said. "I think it will be better for the children."

Mrs. Williams said she taught about 20 years at the Doughty School in Augusta before her transfer to 5th Ward two years ago. She attended Allen University, Columbia, S.C., and is working toward a Master's degree in education.

Moving with the principal next fall will be the other 5th Ward teacher, Mrs. Lillie Mae Brittain.

U.S. Extends Deadline To May 6 for Schools To Accept Guidelines

149 of State's Systems Have Pledged to Comply

By JOE BROWN

The deadline for school systems to file notice they will comply with the new federal desegregation guidelines has been extended by the U.S. Office of Education from April 15 to May 6.

As the original deadline approached Friday the Georgia Department of Education had received compliance pledges from 149 of the 183 systems required to make them.

State School Supt. Jack P. Nix said the pledges from the remaining 24 systems were probably en route and would be received Monday.

Nix says he knows of no system in Georgia planning to defy the guidelines.

Of Georgia's 195 school systems, five that do not operate separate schools for Negroes and whites and seven now under federal court order to desegregate are not required to sign the compliance pledge.

In announcing the deadline extension Friday afternoon U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II said:

"Because of the delay in issuance of the revised guidelines and the time required by school boards to review the guidelines and take official action, the date for filing the assurance form HEW 441B is being extended until May 6.

"Commitment of the funds for new activities will be scubject to deferral for school systems which have failed to file the assurance by that date."

Howe announced the extension in telegrams sent to chief state school officers in 17 Southern and border states.

Only three Georgia systems last year failed to sign compliance certificates with the first desegregation guidelines handed down by the U. S. Office of Education.

Last month the Office of Education issued new guidelines for desegregation that must be followed if a school district is to be eligible for federal aid. Last year Georgia schools received about $97 million in federal monies.

This week Welfare Secretary John W. Gardner warned he will not hesitate to cut off funds to schools that do not comply with the requirements.

Gardner said the guidelines recognize the complexities of school desegregation, but "they call for very substantial progress and there can be no substitute for progress."

Won't Okay Guidelines, Americus, Sumter Say

The Americus and Sumter County School Systems said Monday they will not comply with the new federal guidelines for school desegregation.

They have until May 6 to reconsider without losing any federal aid. Last year the Sumter County System received $296,699 in federal monies while the Americus City System received $161,251.

Compliance signings approach one-half in 17 Southern and border states. Page 15. Garland Byrd to challenge guidelines. Page 3.

Georgia Department of Education officials say out of the state's 195 systems these are the only two to announce they will defy the U.S. Office of Education directive. Late Monday compliance pledges had been received from 170 systems.

Sumter County School Supt. Edward N. Bailey said: "We will not sign Form 441 to go along with the new guidelines. We recognize the Civil Rights Act of 1964 as being law and go along with it, but we feel the guidelines go further than requirements of the law. We have done everything to fulfill the freedom of choice requirements for pupils."

The Americus system also said it is obeying the civil rights act and charged that the new guidelines exceed the requirement of the law.

The guidelines released in March require integration of teaching staffs at most schools this fall and further desegregation of student bodies.

U.S. Commisioner of Education Harold Howe II says the department has checked with its own attorneys and those of the Justice department and have been assured that the requirements do not exceed the law.

"It is time to lay to rest this talk of illegality," Howe said.

The Americus Board of Education has written the Department of Health, Education and Welfare stating its views. The letter signed by board chairman E. Jean Wise reads:

"The Board of Public Education of the City of Americus will comply in every action with every phase of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

"Our desegregation plan, which was approved by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in 1965, has been amended to include specific instructions outlined in the 1966 guidelines with reference to application to freedom of choice plans.

"Our system was voluntarily desegregated in the summer of 1964. The number of students attending predominantly white schools was substantially increased in 1965.

"No request for transfer has been denied any students and no influence or pressure has been exerted by any school official or employe regarding transfer.

"We solicit instruction from the U.S. Department of Justice should it be determined through legal process that we have failed to abide by any section of the established law.

"We shall continue to operate our public schools in a manner which can best serve all the children in our community with the funds which are available to us.

"We shall put additional federal funds which may be allotted to us to good use in creating new opportunities for all our children, but we do not intend to relinquish the control of our public schools to any federal agency in order to qualify for federal funds."

The Americus System has about 3,000 pupils, while Sumter has about 2,700.

Byrd Suit To Attack Guidelines

SCHOOL DES.
4/19/66 AC

A suit to overthrow the new federal guidelines for school desegregation will be brought by former Lt. Gov. Garland Byrd.

Garland Byrd

Byrd, who lives in Taylor County, said Monday his first action will be to have his county school board enjoined from complying with the guidelines.

Taylor County has already submitted a pledge of compliance to the U.S. Office of Education and local school officials say they know nothing of Byrd's plans.

Byrd said he will not challenge the 1964 Civil Rights Act as being unconstitutional, but will charge that it is being unconstitutionally administered by the federal government.

The act states that federal funds cannot go to a school that is segregated or discriminates racially, but declares this does not mean a school must achieve any specific racial balance, Byrd said.

Byrd said Education Commissioner Harold Howe II in new guidelines issued last month violated "congressional intent" in demanding that school boards actually produce integration.

The suit will also bring in the State Board of Education, Byrd said.

This would place State Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton in the position of defending indirectly federal policies that Gov. Carl E. Sanders himself has attacked.

Sanders last year led Southern governors in protesting the federal plans to require faculty integration which is required this fall under the new guidelines.

Bolton might concede that the legal point of the suit is correct, Byrd said. He said he is prepared to appeal to the Georgia Supreme Court, if necessary, and go into federal court.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Office of Education on Monday had received assurances of compliance with 1966 guidelines from slightly more than one-third of the school system following voluntary desegration plans in 17 Southern and border states.

Officials reported that 687 of 1,945 school systems had for-

The tally was made Sunday night, said federal officials.

A wave of compliance agreements is expected to flow into the Office of Education before May 6, the new deadline for submitting the form.

An official said the Office of Education has received indications that hundreds of compliance agreements are either being prepared or are in the mail to Washington.

For instance, federal officials said 62 of 179 Georgia systems following voluntary desegregation plans have filed the compliance form with the Office of Education.

GEORGIA HAS 170

Georgia School Supt. Jack Nix said Monday that 170 of 195 Georgia systems have signed the compliance form.

If the Office of Education had not extended the deadline for submitting the compliance form from April 15 to May 6, new federal aid would have been subject to deferral in nearly two-third of the school systems of the Southern and border states with voluntary desegregation plans.

3,000 ASSURE

There are approximately 5,000 school systems in the 17 states. Slightly more than 3,000 have assured the Office of Education that they have eliminated dual school systems, are following court-ordered desegregation plans, or have filed no plans.

Only one Louisiana system has filed the compliance form. Five Louisiana systems are following voluntary plans and 35 are desegregating under court orders.

The Office of Education reported these totals for systems which have submitted compliance agreements as of Sunday night.

Five of Georgia's 195 school systems say they will not comply with the new federal guidelines for school desegregation.

Nine others also have not signed compliance pledges but indicate they may do so by the May 6 deadline. Failure to sign could result in the loss of federal school aid.

Joining the systems of Sumter County and the City of Americus, which said Monday they will not comply, are Effingham County, Toombs County and Charlton County.

All say they feel the guidelines requiring the integration of most teaching staffs this fall and further desegregation of student bodies exceed the authority of the 1964 civil rights act.

Charlton County Supt. D. Ray James said, "We have not signed and will not sign HEW 441B until we are assured what we are proposing will be accepted by the federal government."

James said his system has told the Office of Education the local high school will be fully integrated this fall. In attendance will be 273 white pupils and 151 Negroes.

"We don't intend to go to court and we don't intend to go to jail," said James about faculty integration. "But they're asking more than we can do."

"We're not being diehards," he added. "But there's a limit to what is acceptable to our board and what will be supported by the community."

Systems still considering signing are Winder, Camden, Jeff Davis, Seminole, Vidalia, Early, Randolph, Glascock and Terrell.

Taliaferro County, which is under the direction of State School Supt. Jack P. Nix, also has not said what it will do.

The three counties bordering it say they will not accept transfer students. All of Taliaferro white pupils transferred last fall to schools in Warren, Wilkes and Greene counties.

After weeks of racial demonstrations the federal court stepped in and forced the three to also accept Taliaferro Negroes who requested transfer.

Forty Georgia school systems have attached written stipulations with their signed agreements to the new school desegregation guidelines which probably will make the documents void.

However, it is expected that additional negotiations between the individual school systems and the officials of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare will bring the systems into compliance.

An official of the Georgia Department of Education said 51 school systems of the 164 that have signed compliance forms made changes in the HEW Form 441B. However, 11 of the 51 made only minor changes.

THE OTHER 40 systems tacked on appendixes spelling out changes and reservations they have.

B. C. Cloer of the State Department of Education's state-federal relations division said he imagines these 40 will have to be renegotiated.

B. C. CLOER
State-Federal Relations

"Most likely, they will not be acceptable," he said. "But at least they're (the systems) indicating they're willing to negotiate."

In Washington, an official of HEW was less outspoken.

He was asked whether the 40 school systems that have filed amendment compliance forms would have them declared void.

He answered, "It would appear so. (He paused.) It's hard to say. (He paused again.) I'd rather not comment on that."

The official asked that his name not be used.

ONE SOUTH GEORGIA school superintendent — who also requested that his name be deleted — said HEW had told him that any alteration in the signed form would make the agreement void.

Mr. Cloer, however, said he believed the appendix would have to change the meaning of the compliance form before the agreement would be rejected.

"I feel like HEW will be reasonable in their negotiations," he said. "Some of the changes amount to only one word."

The principle area where stipulations and reservations were tacked on is faculty integration.

Taliaferro to Integrate Schools

SCHOOL DESEG. AC 4/26/66

By DON PHILLIPS

Taliaferro County has agreed to reopen its school system on an integrated basis next fall, it was learned Monday.

Jack Nix

The decision was revealed in a brief filed in federal district court by State Schools Supt. Jack Nix which asked that he be relieved as receiver of the Taliaferro school system.

All but a Negro Taliaferro school was closed last fall when white students transferred to neighboring Warren, Wilkes and Greene counties to avoid integration.

Racial demonstrations ensued in Crawfordville when Negroes were not allowed to ride white buses out of the county, and former Schools Supt. Claude Purcell was ordered by a federal district court in Atlanta to find a solution. Negroes were eventually allowed on the buses.

Warren, Wilkes and Greene counties have informed Taliaferro they will not accept transfer students next fall, however, and the Taliaferro Board of Education agreed April 15 to open one integrated high school and one integrated elementary school next fall.

The court brief said the Taliaferro system would move to obtain federal financial assistance as soon as it could legally do so. It was estimated the system would be eligible for $74,592.78 in federal funds.

Nix told the court "the point has been reached where the providing of an education for the children of Taliaferro County necessitates return of the management and control of the Taliaferro County school system to the local officials who are responsible for its operation."

The brief revealed that Negro Taliaferro students who transferred to other counties "earn considerable lower grades and have a much higher rate of failure than the white students."

Nix pointed out in the brief that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare had refused to provide funds for remedial assistance to Negro students.

U.S. BIDS COURT SET SCHOOL GUIDELINES

Asks Uniform Decree for 7 Cases Pending in South

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 26—Noting a general lag in desegregation of school districts under court order, the Department of Justice petitioned tonight for a uniform decree that would have the effect of speeding integration in many Southern cities and counties next fall.

The department made the request to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in a brief filed in New Orleans in seven pending cases.

In effect, the department said a new judicial tool was needed to correct the lag between the district and appeals courts, a lag that has resulted in a wide disparity in desegregation progress and widespread failure to conform with the latest executive and judicial standards.

A "uniform and comprehensive decree" for the seven cases, the department said, would be "unmistakable precedent" for all school systems in the South under court order.

The model decree requested by the department follows closely the desegregation guidelines drawn by the office of education for districts permitting students to choose their schools. Most districts in the South are under freedom-of-choice plans.

The guidelines are for school districts not under court order. They make up the majority of districts in the South and are being desegregated by the executive branch under the Civil Rights Act of 1964. However, more than 200 districts, chiefly covering urban areas, are being desegregated under court order.

The seven cases concern Jackson, Claiborne, Caddo and Bossier parishes in Louisiana and Jefferson Conty (Birmingham) and the city of Bessemer in Alabama, all of which had been desegregated earlier under suits filed by the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

The department said that of almost 100 freedom-of-choice plans approved in the Fifth Circuit, almost half did not desegregate all grades by 1967, as required by the executive guidelines; 78 failed to provide nonracial citeria for denying students their choice, and 79 failed to provide a start in faculty desegregation.

Conformity Sought

The Office of Education guidelines were based on the most advanced court orders. The Justice Department is now asking that these standards be made uniform, in part to keep districts from choosing the court route as the slowest form of desegregation.

Thus tonight's action could help put down a revolt by many districts against stringent new requirements in the guidelines. In order to receive Federal assistance, districts must desegregagte under one of the two routes.

The Justice Department said the courts had been overburdened with court cases and a uniform decree would estimate much of the litigation.

"There will no longer be occasion for the periodic submission of amended plans," the department said. "Instead, the school boards will clearly understand their obligations, and will report to the court on a periodic basis. The court would continue to have the final responsibility for fixing constitutional standards."

U.S. Seeks Integration Uniformity

SCHOOL DESEG.
A C 4/27/66

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Justice department proposed Tuesday night a uniform school desegregation order for federal courts and asked the South's highest federal court to adopt it as a model.

The proposed order generally follows the new and tougher guidelines of the U.S. Office of Education. It calls for desegregation of all public school grades by the fall of 1967, under the "freedom of choice" system of pupil distribution.

Assistant Atty. Gen. John Doar submitted the proposal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, the last stop for Southern civil rights litigation before the Supreme Court.

He asked that court to apply the order to seven school districts in Alabama and Louisiana whose present desegregation plans are being appealed.

Then, Doar said, the court should promulgate its order as a guide to all U.S. district courts in its jurisdiction.

The need for a standard plan is apparent, the government said, from the fact that 99 plans approved by district courts in the past 10 years fall below federal requirements under the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Aptitudes Case Faces Top Court

SCHOOL DESEG
AC. 4/28/66

SAVANNAH, Ga. (AP)—The U.S. Supreme Court likely will be asked again to hear an appeal questioning the scholastic aptitudes of Negro school children.

The high court refused to hear an appeal on the question in 1964 in the long-standing Savannah school desegregation case.

The involved suit has been in the courts since 1962. It has been appealed again to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals. No matter what the decision of the appelate court is, it is likely that the Supreme Court again will be asked to rule.

NO COMMENT

The high court in its earlier refusal to hear the appeal issued no comment.

The original suit was filed by Negro pupils who asked that schools in Savannah and Chatham County be desegregated.

Since this suit, a group of white parents intervened on behalf of the school board and the Department of Justice intervened on behalf of the Negro pupils.

In his latest ruling, U.S. District Judge Frank M. Scarlett of Brunswick ordered that pupils must be assigned to schools on grounds of age, mental qualifications, intelligence and achievement rather than by race.

This ruling has been appealed on behalf of the Negroes by the Department of Justice, the school board and the white parents.

HEARD TESTIMONY

The most startling developments in the long court procedure came three years ago, when Scarlett heard detailed testimony from psychologists and others aimed at forcing the Supreme Court to change its 1954 school desegregation decision.

Among those testifying was Dr. Ernest Van Den Haag of New York, a professor of psychology and sociology at New York University and the New School of Social Research.

"Psychological injury from segregation is far less than from forced integration to both white and colored races," he declared.

Another witness, Dr. R. T. Osborne, professor of psychology and director of the Student Guidance Center at the University of Georgia, said a published study by him showed that Negro pupils have lower learning capacity than white pupils.

FEDERAL RIGHTS UNDER SCHOOL DESEGREGATION LAW

STAFF PAPER PREPARED FOR THE

MISSISSIPPI STATE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

TO THE

U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

APRIL 1966

Free choice plans for desegregating schools under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 tend to place the burden of desegregation on Negro students and their parents.[1/]

The vast majority of plans submitted by school authorities in Deep South States have been "Free Choice" plans. Out of the 108 plans accepted by the Office of Education from Mississippi, 104 employ the "Free Choice" method. Twenty school districts are operating under court orders. According to estimates made by the Southern Education Reporting Service in December 1965, the number of Negroes attending school with white students in Mississippi was 1,750 or less than 1% of the State's Negro school population.

At the request of the Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, the Commission staff prepared this paper to assist Negro pupils and their parents in understanding their rights under current Federal school desegregation law.

1/ U.S. Office of Education (Department of Health, Education, and Welfare) Revised Statement of Policies for School Desegregation Plans Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, March 1966.

1. DESEGREGATION PLANS

Q. HOW CAN I FIND OUT IF MY SCHOOL DISTRICT RECEIVES FEDERAL MONEY?

A. Most school districts receive Federal assistance. You can find out about your school district by writing to the U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C.

Q. IF IT DOES RECEIVE FEDERAL MONEY WHAT REQUIREMENTS MUST IT MEET?

A. If a school district is not under court order to desegregate, it must either be desegregated or follow a plan for desegregation of students, teachers, facilities, transportation, services, etc. If it is under court order, it must obey the court order. If it does not meet any of these three requirements, the Office of Education may refuse to give Federal money to that district. In addition, a suit can be brought by a parent or organization.

Q. WHAT KINDS OF DESEGREGATION PLANS ARE ACCEPTABLE?

A. There are several kinds of desegregation plans acceptable to the Federal government. Most of the communities in the South use a "Freedom of Choice" plan. Others divide the community into attendance areas and assign each child to the school for his area. Some districts close small Negro schools and assign the Negro children and teachers to white schools. Still others put only a few grades in each school and assign children by grade regardless of race.

Q. HOW LONG WILL THE PLANS TAKE TO ACHIEVE DESEGREGATION OF ALL GRADES?

A. Most of the plans called for desegregation of all 12 grades for the 1965-66 school year. All plans must provide for desegregating 12 grades by 1967-68.

Q. WHAT IF MY CHILD'S GRADE IS NOT YET COVERED BY THE DESEGREGATION PLAN?

A. The child can transfer to a white school under any of the following conditions: (1) his present school does not offer the course of study he desires, (2) he wants to attend a desegregated school already attended by a brother, sister or any relative living in his household, (3) he meets all the requirements for transfer under ordinary circumstances, (4) he would otherwise have to attend school outside of the school district.

Q. WHAT IF MY CHILD IS ENTERING THE SCHOOL SYSTEM FOR THE FIRST TIME IN A GRADE THAT IS NOT COVERED BY THE CURRENT "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" PLAN?

A. He may attend the school of his choice.

Q. HOW WILL I KNOW IF MY SCHOOL DISTRICT HAS A "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" PLAN?

A. Most school districts in the South use "Freedom of Choice" plans. If the district is under this plan, each pupil and his parents will receive a letter in the spring explaining their rights under the plan along with a Choice of School Form and a notice explaining the plan.

Q. WHAT WILL THE "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" LETTER SAY?

A. The letter will come from your school superintendent in the spring. It will ask parents and pupils to choose a school within 30 days. The choice form will list all schools that you may choose from (both white and Negro) and their grades and locations. The notice will explain the plan in detail.

Q. WILL STUDENTS WHO RETURN THEIR FORMS EARLY HAVE A BETTER CHANCE OF GETTING INTO THE SCHOOL OF THEIR CHOICE?

A. No. All letters must be mailed to parents on the first day of the choice period. There can be no preference given to those who return their forms early in the 30-day period.

Q. CAN THE CHILD CHOOSE HIS OWN SCHOOL?

A. Yes, if he is fifteen years old or will enter grade 9, 10, 11 or 12 next year.

Q. WHAT IF I DON'T RETURN THE CHOICE FORM DURING THE 30-DAY CHOICE PERIOD?

A. You may return it at any time before the child begins school next year. If the form is not filled out by the end of the first week of school, the child will be assigned to the school nearest his home where space is available, without regard to race.

Q. CAN A TEACHER OR PRINCIPAL TELL ME WHICH SCHOOL TO CHOOSE?

A. No. You and your child decide which school he will choose. Teachers, principals and other school officials may not tell you which school to choose or to influence your choice in any way.

Q. CAN MY CHILD'S NAME BE PRINTED IN THE NEWSPAPER OR PUBLICIZED IF I CHOOSE A WHITE SCHOOL?

A. No. It is a violation of Federal regulations to publicize information about choices made by individual students or about the schools to which they are assigned.

Q. WHAT IF ONLY A FEW NEGRO CHILDREN ENTER WHITE SCHOOLS IN MY SCHOOL DISTRICT UNDER A "FREEDOM OF CHOICE" PLAN?

A. If your school district has a sizable percentage of Negro children and most of them are still in Negro schools, the Federal government can require the school district to take additional actions to desegregate, such as holding a new choice period, increasing teacher desegregation, or putting into effect some other kind of plan.

2. COURT ORDERS

Q. WHAT IS A SCHOOL DESEGREGATION COURT ORDER?

A. A School Desegregation Court Order is the instruction given by the court after a school district has been sued and found to have been maintaining segregated schools. It tells the school district what it must do to achieve desegregation.

Q. WHAT IF THE SCHOOL DISTRICT DECIDES TO DO WITHOUT FEDERAL MONEY - AND CONTINUES TO HAVE SEGREGATED SCHOOLS?

A. The law requires a school district to desegregate whether or not it receives Federal money. If a school district has been sued and ordered to desegregate it must obey the court's order. If it has not been sued, one or more parents or an organization can sue a school district to force it to desegregate. If a parent can't afford to sue, cannot get a lawyer, or is otherwise unable to sue, he can make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C. and ask the Federal government to sue.

Q. HOW DO I FIND OUT IF MY SCHOOL DISTRICT IS UNDER COURT ORDER?

A. To find out about your district, write to the Office of Education, Washington, D.C. or the Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C.

Q. HOW DO I FIND OUT WHAT MY SCHOOL DISTRICT MUST DO UNDER THE COURT ORDER?

A. Since court orders are often hard to understand, you might ask a lawyer to explain it to you. He, or you, can get a copy from the Clerk of the Federal Court for a fee.

Q. HOW CAN A COURT ORDER BE CHANGED TO BRING ABOUT FASTER SCHOOL DESEGREGATION?

A. One or more parents or an organization can sue a school district for a better method of school desegregation. Parents can also make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C. asking the Federal government to sue.

3. VIOLATIONS AND COMPLAINTS

Q. WHAT CAN I DO IF LOCAL OFFICIALS DO NOT OBEY THE DESEGREGATION PLAN OR COURT ORDER?

A. You can make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice and to the Equal Education Opportunities Program, U. S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C.

Q. HOW DO I KNOW WHETHER TO SEND MY COMPLAINT TO THE OFFICE OF EDUCATION OR THE DEPT. OF JUSTICE?

A. To be sure it gets to the right one, send the same information to both.

Q. WHAT INFORMATION SHOULD BE IN THE COMPLAINT?

A. The complaint can be a letter. It should contain the facts you are complaining about, including the name and address of the schools involved, names of people, dates of incidents, and any other details that you are able to give.

Q. DO I HAVE TO SIGN THE COMPLAINT?

A. You must sign all complaints to the Dept. of Justice, but it is not necessary to sign complaints to the Office of Education. However, it makes it easier for them to investigate if they know who complained. If you do not wish to give your name, just write out what happened and mail it without signing it.

Q. CAN I COMPLAIN TO THE OFFICE OF EDUCATION BY TELEPHONE?

A. Yes. The number in Washington, D. C. is (202) 962-0333. Ask for the Equal Educational Opportunities Office and tell them you have a complaint.

Q. WHERE ELSE MAY I SEND A COPY OF MY COMPLAINT?

A. You may send a copy of your complaint to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Washington, D. C. You should also keep a copy for yourself.

Q. AFTER MAKING A COMPLAINT, WHAT KIND OF RESPONSE SHOULD I EXPECT?

A. You should expect a letter acknowledging that your complaint has been received. In some cases a Federal representative may come to discuss it with you. He will have identification to show that he is a Federal official. In other cases he may telephone you.

Q. WHAT IF I RECEIVE NO ANSWER?

A. If you do not receive an answer within a reasonable period of time, you should write or call Washington again to see if your complaint has been received, and what is being done about it.

4. PROTECTION

Q. WHAT KIND OF PROTECTION SHOULD I EXPECT FOR MY FAMILY IF I AM ONE OF THE FIRST TO SEND MY CHILD TO A WHITE SCHOOL?

A. The school authorities are responsible for seeing that no student or staff member interferes with persons exercising rights under the plan or affected by it. Such protection must be given both on and off the school grounds. If they can't provide necessary protection they must seek assistance from other officials.

Q. WHAT IF WE DO NOT RECEIVE PROTECTION FROM LOCAL AUTHORITIES?

A. Notify the nearest FBI office. Also, make a complaint to the Civil Rights Division, Dept. of Justice, Washington, D.C. and to the Equal Educational Opportunities Program, Office of Education, Washington, D.C.

5. NEWLY DESEGREGATED SCHOOLS

Q. WHAT ABOUT TRANSPORTATION TO SCHOOL?

A. Whatever transportation is provided for white children must also be provided for Negro children.

Q. WHAT SHOULD I EXPECT IN THE WHITE SCHOOLS IN TERMS OF DESEGREGATION OF FACILITIES, SERVICES AND ACTIVITIES?

A. The law says that there can be no discrimination in school facilities, services and activities. This includes sports participation, social and educational activities, drinking fountains, washrooms, lunchrooms, classroom seating, auditoriums, locker rooms, use of materials, buses, etc. Also, Negro parents can attend PTA meetings, commencement exercies and all other school events.

Q. WHAT IF MY CHILD IS TREATED BADLY AND INSULTED IN A NEWLY DESEGREGATED SCHOOL BY TEACHERS AND OTHER STUDENTS?

A. It is the responsibility of school officials to see that these things don't happen. You can make a complaint to the local school officials or to the Equal Educational Opportunities Program, U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D. C. and Civil Rights Division, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Washington, D. C. or to all of these.

Q. WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO NEGRO TEACHERS AS SCHOOLS ARE DESEGREGATED?

A. It is a violation of Federal regulations for a school system to dismiss, demote or pass over teachers for retention, promotion or rehiring because of race. If a teacher must be displaced because of desegregation, no teacher from outside the system can be brought in unless the displaced teacher is not qualified to fill the vacancy. If the district is going to have fewer teachers because of desegregation it must retain those who are best qualified regardless of race. Where teachers need to upgrade their skills the Federal government finances programs to train them to be better teachers.

Q. WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR TEACHER DESEGREGATION?

A. The superintendent and school boards have the responsibility for hiring and assigning teachers. They are required to desegregate teaching staffs. A Negro teacher who wishes to be assigned to a white school can so advise the proper school officials in the district.

Q. WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT DIFFERENT SALARIES FOR WHITE AND NEGRO TEACHERS?

A. It is a violation of the Constitution for school authorities to pay different salaries to teachers based on race. A teacher or a group of teachers or a teachers organization can sue the school officials to force them to equalize pay. The Attorney General can join in the suit.

SCHOOL DESEG.

DEEPER FEDERAL INVOLVEMENT DUE

Guidelines Chief Faces Dixie Wrath

By ED ROGERS

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The official most bitterly beset by southern politicians because of the stringent new school desegregation guidelines is planning for even deeper federal involvement in the nation's schools.

"We're planning projects that will require increased funds, increased responsibilities, new legislation," U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe III said. "We want new commitments for more contribution to more effective education."

Howe, a 47 - year - old pipe-smoking "bureaucrat" who looks more like a tweedy professor, has been set upon by group after group of congressmen and other politicians, from state after southern state, who charge that his desegregation guidelines go too far.

They claim that by decreeing "achievement percentages" in school integration Howe stretched a law that flatly said "racial balances" could not be forced, and that Howe decreed faculty integration when the law specifically excludes "employment practices" from its structures.

Sen. Sam J. Ervin Jr., D-N.C., went still further in a recent statement declaring the real goal of the federal government and Howe is federal control of textbooks and teaching subjects.

To this Howe has issued a flat denial, and yet he told United Press International his office is busy making long-range plans calling for deeper federal involvement in public school operations.

"We're looking ahead to where the federal government is going," Howe said. "As we look ahead we're making plans for presidential decisions. We're developing five-year projects."

Howe declined to give more details, saying the plans are still in the "talking stage" and he did not consider it proper to disclose them until after President Johnson looks them over. Asked whether these plans do not portend the controls Ervin foresaw, Howe said:

"Absolutely not. I don't think any of our planning could possibly be interpreted as developing new to me," he said. "Nobody could serve as superintendent without getting into controversy. If a person were purely an academician and hadn't been exposed to officials he'd be a babe in the woods.

"Our top level people including myself have had this experience. We've tried to exude as much sweet reasonableness as possible. The thing I admire about most people in political life is you can disagree and be friends at the same time."

"Absolutely not. I don't think any of our planning could possibly be interpreted as developing federal control."

Howe's insistence with the backing of Justice Department attorneys that his guidelines do not exceed authority given him under the 1964 Civil Rights Act, may become a matter for legal interpretation.

Howe said in his view the federal government should definitely be one of the many participants in the broad influences and "broadly dispersed activity" that shape the course of public school education.

Among the other participants he cited were independent colleges, professional teacher associations, accrediting agencies and organizations created by interstate compacts such as the Southern Regional Education Board. All of these except the last are private.

"All these multiple positions and interests tend to raise the common denominator of education," Howe said. "I see nothing wrong with the federal government joining these broad influences by helping back the needs of education at some weak points."

In replying to Ervin's attack as in other sometimes bitter confrontations with southern congressmen and school officials, Howe remains as articulate and unruffled as his clothes invariably are rumpled.

Attacking politicians find Howe, their new symbol of big-government bureaucracy, a surprise. As horned-rimmed glasses slide down his nose he talks and talks fast, but more like a politician than a professor.

Howe talks in a conciliatory way. This has led to reports that he has made concessions to the protesting emissaries from Dixie states. Howe himself says anyone getting hopes up will be disappointed. He explained it to a reporter in this way:

"I think people hoped for a process of concession rather than clearing up misunderstanding. I hope to continue to be as understanding as I can be and have tried to be. It takes a heck of a lot of patience on both sides. But I have kept the same position from beginning to end, except that I have given them more time."

Howe, born in Hartford, Conn., did graduate work in education and history and served as principal of schools in Massachusetts and Ohio. He was superintendent in Scarsdale, N.Y., from 1960 to 1964. After that job he came to consider himself as much a politician as educator.

DeKalb Placement Draws Warning

SCHOOL DESEG

5/3/66 AJ.

By TOM GREENE

The DeKalb County School System has been warned by federal school officials that it may not be acting in compliance with its own desegregation plan.

DeKalb Supt. Jim Cherry Monday received a telegram from Stanley Kruger, regional desegregation compliance officer with the U.S. Office of Education, telling the superintendent that Mr. Kruger had received word the system is using a "freedom of choice" plan to assign students to schools next year.

Mr. Kruger said DeKalb's approved desegregation plan calls for assignment of pupils on a "geographic attendance zone" basis.

MR. CHERRY, however, said the approved plan is a zone and freedom of choice one, with assignment to a zone coming first. Then a child's parents may request that he be transferred to another school within the district.

He said the misunderstanding apparently arose over the newspaper advertisement placed in a DeKalb paper by the system last week publicising the desegregation plan. Mr. Cherry said the advertisement was based on one drawn up by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and not the system.

Mr. Cherry said Mr. Kruger apparently wants to know whether all DeKalb citizens understand the zone plan.

"The question apparently is whether or not it was done to the extent that it satisfies Mr. Kruger," he said.

"We intend to comply with the law," he added, and DeKalb officials are studying Mr. Kruger's telegram and will attempt to clarify the situation as soon as possible.

DEKALB school officials Monday began sending out "choice of school" forms to parents of over 70,000 pupils asking them to designate the school they wish their child to attend next year.

Mr. Kruger said the system, under its approved plan, should instead have sent letters before April 30 assigning each child to a school within his attendance zone, then allow them to request transfers to another school if they desired to do so. The transfers could be allowed if the school a child preferred to attend was not too crowded.

Mr. Kruger also said the system should have submitted before April 15 a map of school districts indicating any changes in the school zones and reports on staff assignments and anticipated enrollment.

DeKalb County was one of the first systems in the state to have an approved desegregation plan last year and also to sign compliance forms with new guidelines this year.

MR. KRUGER said the whole thing may just be a misunderstanding on procedure, but he finds it hard to understand why. He said he spent some time about three weeks ago with C. L. Harper, DeKalb deputy school superintendent, going over the procedures under DeKalb's approved plan "rather thoroughly."

DeKalb last year had some desegregation of first and eighth grade students. The letters sent out Monday, which must be returned with the parents' choice of school by May 31, would allow desegregation in all grades.

Guidelines Backed At Teacher Meet

SCHOOL DESEG.

By TOM GREENE

The new federal school desegregation guidelines which have stirred up a furor in the South do not go as far toward elimination of discrimination as the law allows, a Florida educator said here Saturday.

Joe Hall, superintendent of Dade County (Miami), Fla., schools, told some 250 Southern educators attending a conference on the guidelines that the question he hears the most about them is "Why don't they (U.S. Office of Education) just stick to the law?"

But the guidelines, he said, "are based upon the law," which bars racial discrimination in any form.

"The law goes a lot farther. These guidelines are just steps in that direction," Mr. Hall said.

THE CONFERENCE at the Americana Motor Hotel, which ended Saturday, was cosponsored by the National Education Association and the American Association of School Administrators to explain the new guidelines and help to head off panic among classroom teachers.

For the first time next fall, some desegregation of faculty will be required.

Those attending the conference represented their local education associations and other professional organizations and school systems in Georgia, Florida, South Carolina and Kentucky.

During a symposium Saturday morning, Mr. Hall said school administrators should emphasize the economies the guidelines are going to bring school systems, by doing away with some schools and the required transportation for them.

At the same time, teachers displaced by the closing of some schools can be utilized in others "to do something about this class size we've been talking about."

Mr. Hall added: "These guidelines will be helpful to us if we proceed as rapidly and effectively as we can to do what guidelines were revealed during an afternoon session of the Georgia delegation.

And federal funds have been approved for a statewide conference to be cosponsored by the Georgia Education Association and the Georgia Teachers and Education Association. Details are to be worked out.

The Georgia delegates also discussed the possibility of local institutes for students and parents to familiarize them with implementation procedures.

Mr. Hall added: "These guidelines will be helpful to us if we proceed as rapidly and effectively as we can to do what is inevitable in our schools."

Mrs. Thelma Davis of Griffin, past president of the Department of Classroom Teachers, said the finger is being pointed at the teachers, and "they are frightened."

BUT IF TEACHERS had the backing, she said, they "will come through. But they are frightened, they are afraid, and I can't think of anything more terrible than to be afraid."

Mrs. Davis said "it's not the children we have to worry about, it's the adults."

And she said she knows from personal experience that "the color of your skin does not determine whether or not you are a good teacher."

George Dabbs, president-elect of the Florida Education Association, said "most of the problems ("or are they privileges?") we will face are problems that really do not exist. They are problems that are developed in the minds of men."

Mr. Dabbs said the professional associations can take the lead in the controversy. "The prime responsibility of the profession is to take a stand for what we know to be right . . . professionaly and morally."

Mrs. Minnie Hitch of Kentucky, president of the National Congress of Colored Parents and Teachers, said the laws have been passed and will be observed. "We will obey the letter of the law, but what about the spirit?" she asked.

SHE POINTED to situations where desegregation ultimately has led to resegregation, and said "the problem is not in the law, the problem is in you and me."

"You know what is right," she said, "but what are we going to do about getting across the spirit? We need to interpret to the community from a standpoint of our home life.

"In our communities, we have the kinds of potential to develop to see to it that these things work" instead of mouthing "pious platitudes about what is right and what is wrong."

She added that "the community's responsibility lies not within the law, but lies behind the law."

Spending at All-Time High But Surplus Is Maintained

5/8/66

Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

SOUTH CAROLINA

COLUMBIA, May 7—South Carolina, true to its long established practice of living within its means, looks to a $27 million surplus at the close of the present fiscal year, June 30, of which $9 million will be added to the reserve; $3.5 million returned to counties for school use at $5 per pupil, and the remainder used for other projects, mostly educational, which had been awaiting a realistic look at the balance sheet.

And this overage was accomplished despite the fact that the 1965-66 appropriation bill for current expenses was the largest on record.

Looking to fiscal 1966-67, the legislature is setting another peak in spending, with a total allotment of around $367 million including earmarked funds.

FURTHER, as usual, the money bill carries no new taxes, and no increases. The nearest thing, and it is in another bill, is the upping of the price of auto tags $1, the money derived to be used to reflectorize all plates and to add 74 patrolmen.

Only once in 25 years has the state run a deficit and it was a minor one. One reason for this is that the governor does not sign a supply bill unless the state auditor certifies that revenue to meet it is "reasonably" in sight. That the estimates are carefully made is borne out by the way they have stood up over the years.

Teachers and other employes from the governor down will get increaased pay, not as much as some would like, but apparently a very fair distribution.

THE CHIEF executive, who now gets $20,000 a year plus generous extras such as a home, servants, automobile and liberal allowances, will be raised to $25,000 with the same benefits. Other constitutional officers, such as secretary of state, treasurer, comptroller general, attorney general, go up from $15,000 to $20,000 a year and retain their autos, etc.

In dishing out the pay boosts, the solons did not overlook themselves. The House voted to make a member's pay $3,000, up $600, plus the usual per diem, travel allowance, etc. The Senate made it $4,000. A free conference committee adjusted the two.

In a supplementary bill, in which some of the surplus was used, is an item of $50,000 for a state historical drama to be staged starting in 1967 near Columbia. Another $150,000 comes from a private fund, already raised. Kermit Hunter, who wrote "Unto These Hills," and other out-of-doors successes, is doing the script.

FBI DENIES WESLEYAN INTIMIDATION

MIDDLETOWN, Conn., May 7 (AP) — FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover says that the FBI made no attempt to intimidate any student or official at Wesleyan University in its investigation of a national student organization.

Hoover said that such a contention by student critics of the FBI at Wesleyan was "a misrepresentation of the truth of the matter."

The FBI chief said further any statement that the FBI was hostile to the goals of academic freedom was "not only utterly false but also is so irresponsible as to cast serious doubt on the quality of academic reason or the motivation behind it."

255 AREAS IGNORE PUPIL BIAS PLEDGE

SCHOOL DESEG.

But 1,498 District Near and in South Qualify for Aid

NYT 5/9/66

WASHINGTON, May 7 (AP) — Two hundred and fifty-five school districts have ignored requests to pledge compliance with civil rights laws in order to qualify for new Federal aid and are regarded as not complying, the Office of Education reported today.

As of the deadline last night, 1,498 school districts in 17 Southern and Border states had pledged to carry out racial desegregation along guidelines set up by the office. About 140 had not sent in formal assurances of compliance but had indicated they intend to do so.

On this basis, the office lists only 255 that have not been heard from and thus have not qualified for new aid. The office did not identify them and will make further efforts to obtain voluntary compliance.

Meanwhile, the ability of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to carry out its role in civil-rights compliance has been thrown into doubt by lack of funds, its chief said today.

Budget Cut Heavy

The Secretary, John W. Gardner, said in an interview, "The House dealt a real blow to our plans for civil rights compliances" when it cut a budget request from $4,132,000 to $927,00.

The budget request had proposed 348 positions and the House reduced this number by 70, Mr. Gardner said.

The item was included in the $10.55-billion 1966-67 appropriations bill for the Welfare and Labor departments passed by the House this week.

Making it plain he intended to seek restoration of the money by the Senate, Mr. Gardner said:

"I don't think we can operate an adequate and balanced program in both the North and the South with this kind of reduction."

Asked why the 1966 civil rights program of the Johnson Administration did not deal directly with de facto school segregation in the North, Mr. Gardner said studies were still under way of such cities as Boston, Chicago and San Francisco in an effort to determine a course of action.

Residential Patterns

"Housing and residential patterns are involved and they are things that are hard to cope with in legislation," he said.

Turning to a discussion of civil rights compliance by hospitals, which is required for those participating in the Medicare program when it begins July 1, Mr. Gardner said:

"We are doing everything humanly possible to get all hospitals into compliance. We are not going to have any area out of compliance if we can help it."

The statistics on hospital compliance as of Friday, as given to the Secretary by the Public Health Service, were:

Questionnaires have been sent to 8,237 hospitals and replies have come from 6,923, or 85 per cent, with 1,314 not heard from.

A total of 5,023 hospitals, or 61 per cent of the total, have been certified to the Social Security Administration as being in compliance. This is about 75 per cent of those that replied.

The service is investigating 1,685 of the replying hospitals and replies from 215 hospitals are still being reviewed.

Mr. Gardner said he wanted to reiterate that the civil rights guidelines for hospitals provide for latitude in reassignment of patients though requiring desegregation of all activities.

"There must be latitude—the doctor has to have latitude," Mr. Gardner said. "We do not intend to interpose ourselves between the doctor and the patient."

"Over a period of time if a Negro ward remains a Negro ward there is no way of concealing it," he said. "Over a period of time the records will show whether an institution has racially based room assignments."

Bronx

Bronx House, one of the more than 59 Greater New York Fund agencies in that borough, will provide day and out-of-town camping facilities this summer for hundreds of children and families. Throughout the year, this neighborhood center acts as a focal point for athletics, classes, clubs, Jewish cultural programs and many other activities.

In the Bronx, there are many kinds of services to the community available through Fund agencies. Among these are homes for convalescents, unwed mothers, the aged and children, facilities for the blind, rehabilitation centers, hospitals and clinics.

If you live or work in New York, the 425 hospital, health and welfare agencies of the Fund are ready to serve you, whoever or wherever you are. To help all those in need, make your contribution where you work to the Fund a generous one.

ALGERIA TAKES OVER FOREIGN-HELD MINES

Special to The New York Times

ALGIERS, May 7—President Houari Boumediene announced Saturday the nationalization of foreign-owned iron, zinc, lead and copper mines throughout the country.

In a nationwide radio and television speech, he said the continued exploitation of Algeria's mines by foreign companies put the Government in an "intolerable situation."

He cited as an example a steel mill near Annaba, formerly Bône, in eastern Algeria. He said the Government had found itself obliged to associate with foreign companies at disadvantageous prices for Algeria's own iron ore.

It is the first measure of nationalization Colonel Boumediene has announced since he came to power last June.

He listed 11 mines, most of them French-owned, that the measure will affect. The Government has already taken over a number of mines which were abandoned by their French owners.

De Gaulle's Itinerary Given

MOSCOW, May 7 (AP) — President de Gaulle will travel to four cities besides Moscow when he visits the Soviet Union June 20. The French leader will go to Novosibirsk, an industrial center in Siberia, and to Leningrad and Volgograd (formerly Stalingrad). He will also stop for a few hours in Kiev.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Desegregation Showdown Near for DeKalb and U.S.

AC 5/10/64

By ART PINE

The DeKalb County School administration and the U.S. Office of Education are heading toward a major confrontation over school desegregation, spokesmen for both sides indicated Monday.

DeKalb still has not replied to the telegram that federal compliance officer W. Stanley Kruger sent last Monday asking for an "immediate explanation" of why the county is not following its approved desegregation plan.

Jim Cherry

School Supt. Jim Cherry has issued statements that the county "is definitely complying "with the federal guidelines, but his office has made no contact with Kruger since the telegram — and doesn't plan to.

Federal officials were beginning to hint Monday about the possibility of "deferring" government grants to DeKalb until the school system conforms to its plan of compliance as the Office of Education sees it.

HINT HIGHER ACTION

And DeKalb administrators, insisting that they are complying even if Kruger says they aren't, were talking privately about taking the matter to Education Commissioner Harold Howe — or to the courts, if necessary.

The new guidelines require that DeKalb 1) assign all pupils to schools according to geographic attendance zones, and 2) then permit them to transfer to other schools if they wish.

Cherry says DeKalb, which reassigned first and eighth graders according to attendance zones last year, has produced enough publicity about its plan of compliance so that it is ready to go ahead with phase two.

Kruger contends that the publicity was inadequate, and that in any case reassigning only two out of 12 grades does not fulfill the requirement. The school system, he says, must reassign the other 10 this year.

Meanwhile, DeKalb has already sent out 70,000 letters to parents implementing phase two of the program—including a form parents can check to choose the school they want their children to attend.

FORMS QUESTIONED

Kruger says the administration sent out the wrong forms—that it should have mailed out maps showing geographic attendance zones for phase one.

Cherry maintains he sent the letters "under duress" at Kruger's orders. "I didn't think they were necessary," he said. "They certainly didn't change anything."

But underneath all this, the argument is really over just how far DeKalb is to desegregate its schools.

The Office of Education wants students reassigned to geographic zones first so Negro pupils "don't have to take the initiative themselves" to get out of all-Negro schools.

"If they have to ask for reassignment right away," Kruger said, "they may hesitate to go ahead with it."

THEIR RIGHT

The administration insists Negro students "should have the right" to stay in all-Negro schools if they want.

"There'd certainly be more desegregation if all students were first assigned by geographic attendance areas," Kruger said Monday. "Otherwise, with just the free-transfer phase in operation, there's a tendency for children to return to the school they've been attending previously."

In essence, DeKalb officials say, they plan to conform to the letter of the compliance law.

Kruger says he plans to issue "another communication" Tuesday if DeKalb still hasn't replied to his now week-old telegram.

Meanwhile, the school administration is sticking to its guns.

Dixie School Leaders to Get Call to Testify on Rights Bill

AC 5/10/66

WASHINGTON (UPI) —Sen. Sam J. Ervin Jr., D-N.C., said Monday he will invite chief school officials of 17 Southern and border states to testify at subcommittee hearings on the 1966 civil rights bill.

A spokesman for Ervin's Senate Judiciary subcommittee on civil rights said the school officials are being invited to speak out especially on an amendment Ervin himself is introducing.

Ervin said on the Senate floor his amendments will halt the present administrative policies that he said require "racial balances" in schools and other institutions receiving federal funds.

AGENCIES TARGET

One target of Ervin's amendment is the policy of the various federal agencies including the U.S. Education Office to order deferment of federal funds if certain desegregation goals are not met.

A spokesman for the education office estimated the latest round of "deferrals" will affect less than 200 school systems in 17 Southern and border states.

Officials of all racially dual systems in these states are being required to submit certificates that they intend to comply wih federal desegregation guidelines.

SOME ON WAY

Of the 1,893 of these systems only 1,498 had mailed in certificates by the deadline last Friday, but the spokesman said many of them are believed to be in transit.

Since deferment applies only to new funds it is not likely that mere tardiness will have any practical adverse effect on any of the schools.

But there have been a number of deferments in the past and Ervin said this bypasses the formal machinery which Congress set up to safeguard rights of schools before funds are formally cut off.

Another target of Ervin's amendment was the guidelines themselves. Ervin said they require certain racial balances in schools, hospitals and other institutions receiving federal funds.

The amendment, he said, will make it clear that federal agencies can bring sanctions only in proven cases of actual discrimination, without regard to de facto racial percentages.

Ervin has scheduled two weeks of hearings before his subcommittee. They are to follow hearings already in progress on the administration's bill in the House.

After Ending 'White Only,' GEA Still Lacks a Negro

SCHOOL DESEG

The Georgia Education Association, which agreed in March to drop its "white only" membership qualification, still does not have a Negro member.

"I'm not surprised," said GEA executive secretary Frank Hughes Tuesday. "Membership taken out now would run out in September. Anyone joining will probably do so then."

The GEA constitution provides: "All persons actively engaged in the educational work of teaching, supervision, administration, libraries, colleges and universities may become active members of the association upon payment of dues."

Annual dues in the 29,000-member organization are $8. The membership year runs Sept. 1 to Aug. 31.

The National Education Association of which the GEA is an affiliate, adopted a resolution last year requiring all state organizations to drop racial barriers and prepare to merge.

The predominantly Negro organization in this state, also an NEA affiliate, is the Georgia Teachers and Education Association. It has about 12,000 members.

Cherry, U.S. Schools Chief To Discuss Guideline Dispute

AC 5/11/66

By ART PINE

DeKalb School Supt. Jim Cherry and U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe will meet Friday for a conference on DeKalb's alleged deviation from federal desegregation guidelines, it was learned Tuesday.

The meeting was arranged by 4th District Rep. James A. Mackay after several private sessions with officials of the U.S. Office of Education.

Cherry said late Tuesday night that he had not received official confirmation of the meeting from either Mackay or Howe, but would be "happy to meet with the commissioner at his earliest convenience."

News of the conference came just after Cherry brushed aside federal compliance officer W. Stanley Kruger and told him he just didn't want to talk with Kruger any more and would take the dispute directly to Howe.

In a telephone conversation with Kruger late Tuesday, Cherry said he was disgusted because Kruger had blasted DeKalb County in the press without first making the statements to Cherry.

"For the past week I've had to get all my information from the press," Cherry told Kruger. "After that kind of treatment, I just don't want to discuss this with you."

The DeKalb superintendent also sent a telegram to Howe that afternoon, presumably restating his position and offering to meet with the commissioner.

But Tuesday he declined to release its contents to reporters until he was sure Howe had received it. "I don't want to do the same thing I'm accusing Kruger of doing," he explained.

Howe could not be reached for comment.

Meanwhile, Kruger said after his phone call to Cherry that

"the situation hasn't changed.

"We still feel DeKalb is not following the procedures approved by the commissioner and amended," he said.

Kruger said he assumed Cherry would confer with Howe or someone higher up on the staff. "I have not been in a position to give (DeKalb) the relief from the guidelines they're seeking," he said.

The compliance officer said his section "still intends to investigate other complaints" received from the Georgia Council on Human Relations and the DeKalb Council on Human Relations.

He said his office had received complaints that the school administration failed to provide adequate information about its plan of compliance, and that geographic attendance zones were "gerrymandered" in areas around Negro schools.

Kruger will be in Atlanta Saturday to speak before a meeting of both councils, he said.

Asst. Supt. C. L. Harper said he thought the Office of Education was "nitpicking" in its charges that DeKalb was deviating from the approved plan of compliance.

He said the county already has 222 Negro pupils enrolled in previously all-white schools. There are 3,600 Negro students in the county, according to Harper.

Cherry telegraphed Howe Tuesday after reading an article in The Atlanta Constitution which reported federal officials were hinting about the possibility of "deferring" government grants if DeKalb didn't comply.

Officials estimated the U.S. government grants "close to $2 million—directly or indirectly" to the county each year.

The dispute began April 2 when Kruger sent a telegram to the school administration asking for an "immediate explanation" of why DeKalb was not following its plan of compliance.

Cherry had not answered Kruger's telegram by Tuesday, and Kruger had not spoken personally with Cherry since then.

The Office of Education maintains that DeKalb, which formally reassigned all first- and eighth-graders according to geographical attendance zones last year, should have done the same thing for pupils in the other 10 grades before sending out 70,000 "free-transfer" blanks.

Cherry says the administration sent out so much publicity about geographical attendance zones in 1965 that in effect it fulfilled the requirements for all grades.

Kruger alleges that DeKalb's procedure forces Negro children to take the initiative in transferring to previously white schools, and that under such circumstances they are usually reluctant to do so.

Cherry Called to Capital

By ART PINE

U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe called DeKalb School Supt. Jim Cherry late Wednesday morning and invited him to an 8:30 a.m. conference next Monday to discuss their differences over DeKalb's degree of compliance with federal desegregation guidelines.

Spokesmen for both officials confirmed Wednesday that Cherry has agreed to travel to Washington for the meeting.

The conference was arranged by Fourth District Rep. James A. Mackay, whose staff had spent more than a week trying to get the two men together.

MAY 2 TELEGRAM

Mackey blamed the whole dispute on "a lack of adequate communication between federal and state officials."

Cherry did not reply to a May 2 telegram from federal compliance officer W. Stanley Kruger asking for an "immediate explanation" for DeKalb's alleged deviation from federal rules.

And Kruger, while not talking to Cherry personally, issued statements to the press blasting the school administration—an action that prompted Cherry to demand to speak with Howe directly.

Mackay said he told the commissioner he thought "a telegram is a rather short means of dealing with so complex a subject as this one—especially in this age of long-distance calls and airplanes."

RAPS "ABRUPTNESS"

The congressman also criticized what he called "Kruger's abruptness with many people, which has created hard feelings not only in our district, but in other districts in Georgia."

He said Kruger had promised him last weekk that he would see Cherry this past weekend while he was attending a National Education Association convention in Atlanta, but there was no meeting.

"I was rather disappointed when I found that out Monday morning," Mackay said.

Kruger told The Constitution earlier that he had tried to call Cherry once over the weekend, but could not reach him. "I was tied up with the conference the rest of the time," he said.

BOTH CONFIDENT

Mackay and Cherry both said they were sure "evrything will be worked out" at Monday's conference. Howe was not available for comment.

The Office of Education maintains that DeKalb, which formally reassigned all first- and eight-graders by geographcial attendance zones in 1965, should have done the same thing for pupils in all other grades this year before sending out 70,000 "free-transfer" blanks May 3.

Kruger alleges that DeKalb's procedure forces Negro children to take the initiative in transferring to previously all-white schools, and that under such circumstances they are usually reluctant to do so.

The Office of Education, in enforcing the guidelines, is seeking complete desegregation in DeKalb—in effect, compliance with "the spirit of the law," as Kruger put it.

18 Southern Senators Urge Johnson to Void New School Guidelines

Russell Writes Letter Calling Rules Unlawful

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—Eighteen Southern Democratic senators have sent a letter to President Lyndon B. Johnson, asking him to use his executive powers to revoke new school desegregation guidelines issued by the U.S. Office of Education.

The previously unpublicized letter was written by Georgia Sen. Richard B. Russell, leader of the Southern bloc in civil rights affairs.

Sen. John Stennis, D-Miss., a signer, passed around the letter for signatures. Among the signers was Georgia Sen. Herman Talmadge.

QUESTION AUTHORITY

Although none of the senators made the letter public, The Constitution was informed that the Southerners argued that the 1964 Civil Rights Act did not provide legal authority for the regulations.

The long letter requested President Johnson to make a a personal investigation of the guidelines and the law on which the Office of Education based the regulations.

The letter expressed confidence on the part of the Southerners that such an examination of the law and the guidelines would reveal to the President that the regulations were not supported by the 1964 act.

PERSONAL INTERVENTION

Johnson was asked to intervene personally to prevent implementation of the guidelines.

The Office of Education has said new federal funds are being deferred for Southern school systems which, by May 6, had not signed an agreement to comply with the regulations.

All but a few hundred of the nearly 2,000 school systems operating under gradual desegregation plans signed the compliance agreement. Some of the districts which signed the form attached special stipulations, and many are expected to be unacceptable to federal education officials.

The letter sent to President Johnson quoted Vice President Hubert Humphrey, floor manager of the 1964 Civil Rights Act while he was still a member of the Senate, to support the Southern contention that the guidelines not only violate the actual intent of the law but the spirit of it.

Humphrey was quoted as saying during Senate debate on the 1964 act that the legislation would not require racial balance in public classrooms.

The Southerners told the President that their states had tried to follow the law, but the Office of Education had gone beyond that point in issuance of the guidelines.

The letter, dated early in May, was delivered to President Johnson this week. There is no indication that Johnson has sent a reply.

Other senators signing the letter were from Virginia, North and South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas.

Talmadge Silent on Plea For LBJ to Revoke Guides

WASHINGTON, May 14 (UPI) — Eighteen southern senators have sent a personal plea to President Johnson that he nullify school desegregation guidelines that confront noncomplying school districts with a cut off of federal funds.

A copy of the "most solemn petition" dated May 2 was made available to newsmen Saturday, a day after John W. Gardner, secretary of health, education and welfare, announced he was ending federal aid in 12 districts in Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi.

The letter to the President said: "We come to you as chief executive of the nation to protest vigorously the abuse of power involved in the bureaucratic imposition of the guidelines and we earnestly beseech your personal intervention to right this wrong and have this order revoked."

In Atlanta, Sen. Herman Talmadge declined to comment on the letter, saying, "I never comment on my communications with the President of the United States." Sen. Talmadge, who even declined comment on whether or not he signed the letter, said his views on the guidelines are well-known.

THE PETITION was said to have been drafted by Sen. Richard B. Russell, D-Ga., veteran leader of the southern bloc and a long-time personal friend of the President.

The revised guidelines were issued in March under authority of the 1964 civil rights law. Failure of schools to take definite steps to integrate can result in withdrawal of federal aid.

The 18 senators from nine states wrote Johnson: "In our efforts to protect our schools and the children who direct the destinies of our states tomorrow, we earnestly appeal to you to intervene and prevent illegal, unfair and unrealistic action by the office of education."

They said they are not appealing as "a token protest entered for political purposes" but as a matter of deep principle.

The southerners noted that many school districts in their states had sought to take initial steps toward desegregation and said "it would be little short of criminal" to undo these efforts towards compliance.

They also said the new guidelines would victimize the children of both races and in some of the poorest communities in the South.

The petition said: "Not only do the announced regulations put an unfair, if not impossible, burden on local officials but in those instances where those officials simply cannot enforce the guidelines, the principal victims will be the children of all races in the schools who stand in the greatest need of adequate financing."

It noted Johnson's often proclaimed interest in education "particularly in assisting the underpriviledged."

"But I am sure," the letter said, "that you will agree that the withdrawal of school funds from communities that are less favored financially will victimize children who are most in need of an education."

Signers were Russell and Sens. John C. Stennis, D-Miss.; Sam J. Ervin Jr., D-N.C.; Herman E. Talmadge, D-Ga.; B. Everett Jordan, D-N.C.; Donald Russell, D-S.C.; Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.; John L. McClellan, D-Ark.; Spessard L. Holland, D-Fla.; Lister Hill, D-Ala.; J. William Fulbright, D-Ark.; Harry F. Byrd Jr., D-Va.; George A. Smathers, D-Fla.; James O. Eastland, D-Miss.; Allen J. Atlanta vice mayor Sam Massell, at a meeting of 600 Negro and white educators, has criticized a group of top Southern legislators who are seeking to revoke desegregation guidelines.

"Take back to your respective communities a word of caution," he told the delegates Saturday at the Biltmore Hotel, "that no one be misled in thinking that 18 senators standing in the schoolhouse door will in any way change the end result —the enforcement of federal law . . ."

Mr. Massell, acting chairman of the Georgia State Advisory Committee, was acting as moderator for a one-day conference on Education Desegregation sponsored by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

The purpose was to discuss the controversial revised set of rules covering school desegregation which came in March from the U.S. Commissioner of Education.

IN HIS COMMENTS, Mr. Massell referred to reports released late this week that 18 senators, including Richard B. Russell and Herman Talmadge of Georgia, have asked President Johnson to revoke or investigate the new guidelines.

Keynote speaker for the meeting was Mrs. Ruby G. Martin, a civil rights worker with the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

She said the guidelines took "months of preparation based on court decisions."

Of the new guidelines, probably the most controversial is the one requiring desegregation of school faculties.

Mrs. Martin said the guidelines don't set a formula or say who must be hired and fired. They only request that the best qualified person — not the race —be considered.

Dr. Tilman C. Cothran, associate administrator of Economic Opportunity Atlanta, said he felt mixing white and Negro teachers in the same school would be the biggest problem.

Changing to integrated faculties "hits at the heart of school desegregation," he said. "Some people fear it because of the image developed: that Negro teachers are inferior to white teachers.

"BUT IF A NEGRO teacher is not qualified to teach white pupils then he's not qualified to teach Negro pupils," Dr. Cothran declared.

Howard Moore Jr., an Atlanta Negro attorney, said that everyone seems to "loose sight of the fact that schooling has to do with people.

"In the South we see education in terms of black and white . . . not the sharing of nuances, irony or the sense of communication."

Mr. Moore said that Atlanta city schools need not comply with the new guidelines since schools here are integrated by means of a court order forming its own guidelines.

But W. Stanley Kruger, director of Area II of the Equal Educational Opportunities Program, said that the Justice Department is seeking ways to modify and up-date existing court desegregation orders.

Mr. Kruger also explained that the new guidelines were compiled "to amend loopholes that escaped detection (in former guildelines) last year.

Comply With Guides, DeKalb Board Urged

The DeKalb branch of the NAACP has urged the DeKalb Board of Education to comply with federal school guidelines by abandoning its freedom-of-choice policy and assigning students to schools in attendance zones.

In a letter to Supt. Jim Cherry, Charles E. Price, DeKalb NAACP president, said, "The time has come to transfer this burden of choice which lay heavy on the shoulders of the parents and students to the Board of Education which is better prepared to carry it."

The letter read "The assignment policy will accomplish the stated objectives of school desegregation immediately. Our experience with freedom of choice left much to be desired."

SUPT. CHERRY, who has been embroiled in a controversy over DeKalb's compliance with the new desegregation guidelines, is due to meet in Washington Monday with U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe.

In meeting with Mr. Howe, on the matter, Mr. Cherry, in effect, will be going over the head of the local federal compliance officer, W. Stanley Kruger, who has charged that DeKalb has deviated from its approved plan. He has charged that DeKalb is not assigning students to schools in geographic zones.

DeKalb does operate on a plan similar to assignment by zone, but not completely so. Although children may apply for transfers, they are not assigned to any particular school. Mr. Cherry is known to oppose any "forcing of Negro students to attend previously white schools."

Throw Out U.S. Guidelines, Byrd Asks Georgia Court

SCHOOL DESEG.

COLUMBUS, Ga. (AP)—Former Lt. Gov. Garland T. Byrd says the 1966 federal school desegregation guidelines clash with the 1964 Civil Rights Act and has asked a state court to bar their use.

In a suit filed Friday with Superior Court Judge John H. Land, the Reynolds attorney asked injunctions against the federal government, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the school board of his home county, Taylor.

Byrd said Friday he resigned two weeks ago his position as Taylor County Attorney to block possible countersuit by the federal government.

Byrd said as a gesture of compliance with the guidelines the Taylor board ordered six Negro pupils to the formerly all-white high school in addition to the two Negro pupils already registered there under a freedom of choice plan.

He said W. Stanley Kruger of HEW had indicated to the board that a transfer of 10 per cent of the country's Negro high school pupils — or about 75 pupils—would be satisfactory, and that the system faced loss of federal funds if it did not comply.

Charging the six Negro pupils were assigned against their will, Byrd said the move discriminated against the six and against white pupils as well.

He quoted Title IV of the Civil Rights Act as saying "desegregation does not mean assignment of students to public schools to overcome racial imbalance."

The suit asks that the Taylor school board be enjoined from carrying out "the proposed plan of desegregation in the two high schools of Taylor County," that HEW be barred from giving the board orders and that the government be prevented from withholding federal funds.

Land scheduled a preliminary hearing for June 3 at Columbus, and said he would hear the case unless the federal government acts to remove it to a federal court. Byrd said he fully expects the government to do so.

Byrd admitted there is a possibility the county could lose its federal aid, saying, "I'd rather have a second-rate system without federal funds than a 10th-rate and unworkable system" under the guidelines.

SCHOOLS STUDIED ON DE FACTO ISSUE

Rights Commission Names Panel of 14 for Inquiry

NYT 5/22/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 21—The United States Commission on Civil Rights announced today the appointment of 13 educators and a businessman to direct a study of de facto segregation in public schools.

The study, ordered last November by President Johnson, is expected to determine what the Administration will do about what Mr. Johnson has called "racial isolation" in classrooms where there is no official policy of segregation.

The Office of Education is attempting to achieve some progress toward racial balance in Southern districts that have maintained a dual system through official policy. This is being done under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which is intended to ban racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

However, plans to use Title VI in districts outside the South have been abandoned on the ground that such action cannot be legally maintained where there is no clear proof that officials intended to discriminate.

Dr. John A. Hannah, chairman of the commission, who is president of Michigan State University, said that Dr. Thomas B. Pettigrew, associate professor of social psychology at Harvard University, would be chief consultant for the project and chairman of the civilian advisory committee.

Dr. Pettigrew will have chief responsibility for developing the study and supervising the project. His view of the problem is well known. In a position paper submitted to a White House conference on education last year, he wrote:

"The blunt truth is that 'Negro education' is generally grossly inferior to 'white education' in both the North and South; it typically involves less expenditure per child, less trained and experienced teachers, and less adequate facilities; and it often prepares Negro youth through both its explicit and implicit curricula to assume only low-skilled employment."

Others named to the panel are:

Samuel Brownell, Superintendent of Schools, Detroit

Benjamin E. Carmichael, Superintendent of Schools, Chattanooga

Kenneth B. Clark, director, Social Dynamics Research Institute, City College, New York

James Coleman, professor of social relations, John Hopkins University

Rashi Fein, economist, the Brookings Institute, Washington

John H. Fisher, president of Teachers College, Columbia University

Philip N. Hauser, director, University of Chicago's Population Research and Training Center

Vivian Henderson, president, Clark College, Atlanta

Peter Rossi, director, National Opinion Research Center, Chicago

Judson Shaplen, dean, Graduate School of Education, Washington University, St. Louis

Neil V. Sullivan, Superintendent of Schools, Berkley, Calif.

John A. Wheeler, president, Mechanics and Farmers Bank, Durham, N.C.

Robin Williams, professor of sociology, Cornell University.

Although it has been six months since the president ordered the study, little has been done about it pending the appropriation of funds. Last week, Congress voted $399,000 for the study for the fiscal year 1966, which ends June 30. The commission has requested an additional $658,000 for the study for the fiscal year 1967.

Dr. Hannah said the study would determine the extent of racial isolation in schools and its effect on children. It will aso examine the structural patterns of the racial make-up of schools and its relationship to housing and employment, as well as legal questions involved in the use of Federal funds.

In a letter to the commission last Nov. 1, Mr. Johnson said:

"I trust that the task can be completed expeditiously and that your findings may provide a basis for action not only by the Federal Government but also by the states and local school boards which bear the direct responsibility for assuming quality education."

 SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

South Intensifies Resistance to U.S. Guidelines for School Integration

BY GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, May 22—Scores, perhaps hundreds, of Southern school districts appear to be headed for a showdown with the Federal Government over its new guidelines for school desegregation.

Although the deadline for filing compliance agreements for the 1966-67 school year fell two weeks ago, about 135 systems still refuse to submit them as the first step toward meeting government demands.

This is twice as many "holdouts" as in the current school year. Yet, it is only a partial picture of resistance in the South. Many more school systems—40 in Georgia alone—have submitted agreements, but attached conditions to them that fall short of full compliance.

And even among the school districts that have signed compliance forms without reservations, there remains hope that they can do less than what the Government is demanding — a "substantial start" toward abolishing the dual school system in the South.

Rights Act Challenged

All this is an open challenge to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and it means that the Government must either soften its demands or cut off Federal school aid in the South on a far greater scale than it has yet contemplated.

Civil rights and human relations organizations are becoming concerned that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which administers the school provisions of the rights act, is giving way to Southern pressure.

Department officials deny the charge and say that they are not pessimistic about compliance, but they acknowledge that pressure against them is increasing.

This month alone, 18 Southern Senators wrote to President Johnson urging that he modify the guidelines on faculty desegregation and pupil integration.

And in Alabama, Gov. George C. Wallace sumoned the state's entire Congressional delegation to the state capital to urge other Southern Governors and local school systes to stand firm against the guidelines.

During the current school year, the number of Negroes attending classes with whites in the South climbed from 2.3 per cent of the total Negro student population to about 6 per cent in the South's 1,942 school districts. But in Mississippi and Alabama, the figure remained below 1 per cent.

This brought sharp criticism from civil rights organizations. Subsequently the education office devised a 10-page set of guidelines in which it said Southern schools would have to desegregate faculties "substantially" and increase the number of Negro students in classes with whites.

At first there was little reaction, but as Southern whites realized that the office wanted to ultimately abolish dual school systems the resistance grew.

"A great many communities last year accepted the notion of having a few Negro children in white schools," said David S. Seeley, assistant United States commissioner of education.

"But the notion that the Negro and white schools will eventually disappear—that we'll just have public schools — is not yet accepted," he said.

Many school officials complain that, despite the assault on the South's dual school systems, the Government is doing little to end de facto segregation in the North.

And Senator Sam Ervin of North Carolina and other Southern Senators are contending that the guidelines are illegal because they violate a section of the Civil Rights Act that says "racial balance" shall not be required in schools.

Federal school officials, however, hope that the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit will strengthen their position. In New Orleans on Tuesday the full nine-member court will hear a Justice Department appeal for uniform guidelines for school districts that are under court order to desegregate.

Some court-ordered plans now are less strict than the Office of Education guidelines, according to civil rights organizations, and thus make it advantageous for school systems to refuse to desegregate voluntarily.

Meanwhile, resistance to the Office of Education guidelines has spread to many school officials who supported the office's demands during the current school year.

In Alabama, for example, State Superintendent Austin R. Meadows defied Governor Wallace last year and worked with local school systems t bring about compliance. But this year, he is one of the office's bitterest critics, contending that the guidelines would "destroy local self-government of education."

In North Carolina, where many school superintendents complied cheerfully last yeafr, a Federal official reduced superintendents to laughter at a recent meeting by suggesting:

"If I were a superintendent, I would try to get some help from the P. T. A. [in building support for the guidelines]."

The superintendents said that many white parents were rebelling at the thought of Negro teachers for their students and the merging of white and Negro school systems.

And in Greenville, Miss., which has had the reputation of being one of the state's most moderate cities on race, the school board had voted not to comply with the new guidelines.

Office Is Criticized

"I get the feeling from reading the directives and listening to the Government representatives that they look on teachers as 'checkers' who can be moved around and assigned to any school regardless of criteria," the Southern Education Reporting Service quoted Superintendent Ben L. Bryan of St. Lucie County, Fla., as saying.

In trying to allay the criticism of state and local schoo officials, Federal officials have stirred criticism of themselves.

After a meeting in which Commissioner of Education Harold Howe 2d explained that the guidelines werre "flexible," State Superintendent Jack Nix of Georgia announced that the new guidelines would be easier "to live with" than he had initially thought.

This brought charges from the Southern Regional Council, a human relations and research organization, that Mr. Howe's office appeared to be "backing down."

Paul Anthony, the council's director, says the office brought problems on itself by accepting "only paper compliance from many school boards last year."

He said some school superintendents acted in "good faith" and sharply increased desegregation, only to discover that a neighboring county "had done very little and had gotten by with it."

The council also has expressed disappointment that Federal aid has been cut off to just 12 school districts for failure to comply with the current year's desegregation program. Under the Civil Rights Act, Federal funds can be denied any school district that does not desegregate.

The Office of Education says it is not "overly disappointed" that there are 135 holdouts, adding that the "real test" will come this summer. The office starts examining desegregation plans then to determine if "a substantial start" will be made.

SCHOOL DESEG.

Uniform mix rules foreseen

BN 5/26/66

BY JAMES CHISUM, News staff writer

NEW ORLEANS, May 26—A U. S. Court of Appeals appears likely to adopt a uniform model for court desegregation of Southern schools. Comments from the judges on the bench indicate they think that some sort of uniformity is desirable.

The decree probably will follow fairly closely guidelines for voluntary desegregation established by the U. S. Office of Education.

But it is doubtful that the decree will move as fast and as far to integrate the schools as civil rights forces would like.

A Justice Department attorney Wednesday rebuffed a CORE appeal to dump "freedom of choice" plans for desegregation.

THE APPEAL came during hearings in which the Justice Department had asked the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals for a uniform decree. The uniform decree submitted by the Justice Department was concerned with the carrying out of freedom of choice plans.

David Norman, the Justice Department attorney, said such plans are recognized as "transitional."

"Our position today is that there's still going to be some kind of transition period, and therefore we do not talk about instantaneous integration," he said.

Instead, said Norman, the Justice Department is concerned more with the procedure of changing a school district from segregated to desegregated.

"WE'VE COME a long way, and we're going to speed it up," he said. The attorney said the deparment's policy has been that if a desegregation plan is to "lean on the student" (require the student to make the effort to go to a white school) it will be "ringed with all kinds of restrictions."

Before Norman's remarks, CORE lawyer Carl Rachlin asked the court to reassess freedom of choice desegregation plans and reject them. Experience has shown they don't result in desegregated schools, he said. He also declared the Justice Department's proposed decree is insufficient.

Turn to Page 8, Column 6

Mix

"They mean well. But they're not looking at reality," said Rachlin.

Norman agreed that freedom of choice plans, adopted by nearly all Southern school districts facing desegregation, allow a delay in integration of the schools. But the courts have agreed to a transition period, he said.

"IF THERE'S no longer to be a transitional period, then the courts should say so." he said.

The Justice Department's proposed decree and the Office of Education guidelines indicate at least some difference on the point of whether the results of desegregation plans are to be considered during the transition period.

The guidelines include statistics which the Office of Education said will be used to measure the effectiveness of desegregation plans.

The Justice Department's decree doesn't include the suggested proportion of teachers and students which should be in a desegregated system this year.

Rachlin spoke as a representative of Negro school children in the Jackson Parrish, La., school system. Others included in the two-day hearing were Jefferson County, Fairfield and Bessemer, Ala., and Caddo, Bossier, and Claiborne Parrishes in Louisiana and Clarksdale, Miss.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT and NAACP lawyers and others representing plaintiffs during the two-day hearing argued that extremely small numbers of Negro students enrolled in formerly all-white schools prove that desegregation plans must be altered.

A Louisiana legislator, representing Bossier Parrish, Wednesday said even small amount of integration there is significant.

"I know we shouldn't have the Ku Klux Klan and all that, Judge, but I'm facing reality... You've got a hundred years of tradition. When 31 students break across that barrier, that's significant," he said.

The attorney also pointed out that the systems in the state are already encountering difficulty in obtaining teachers, especially with desegregation of school staffs coming.

"YOU CAN'T order effective faculty desegregation. These people don't have to teach," he said. He suggested that the court "stay out" of faculty desegregation.

"It has to get in it. So just forget that argument," commented Judge John Minor Wisdom of New Orleans, one of three judges on the panel conducting the hearing. The others are Judge Home Thornberry of Texas and Judge Harold Cox of Mississippi.

Judge Wisdom on several occasions indicated a belief that "freedom of choice" plans of desegregation are inefficient in operation of a school system.

"It is difficult for me to understand why a Southern school district would prefer a freedom of choice plan over zoning except as a means of avoiding integration," he said.

There were indications that the court would prefer the Justice Department to go further than it did in the proposed decree. At one point, Judge Wisdom suggested to a Justice Department attorney that he submit supplements covering special classes for retarded children and kindergarten.

The court asked that supplementary briefs be mailed to all nine members of the federal Court of Appeals. This action and comments from the bench indicated a ruling may not come for some time.

Court to Test Guidelines This Week

NEW ORLEANS (UPI)—The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments this week for and against a sweeping Justice Department proposal that could end public school desegregation in the Deep South by next fall.

The government wants the court to adopt Department of Health, Education and Welfare guidelines for school desegregation, which call for total integration by 1967.

The court to a great extent already has used HEW guidelines in deciding its case, but the timetable has varied.

Eleven school boards in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia are defendants in the department's effort to speed up desegregation. All are desegregated or under court order to do so. But government attorneys and Negroes feel the pace has been slow.

The court's decision will be used as a guide by district courts in the four states plus Texas, Florida and the Panama Canal Zone, which comprise the 5th Circuit.

A three-judge panel will hear Tuesday the cases of the cities of Fairfield and Bessemer, Ala.; Jefferson County, Ala.; East Baton Rouge Parish, La., and the city of Monroe, La., Tuesday.

Wednesday, it will be Caddo, Bossier, Jackson and Claiborne parishes, La.; Richmond County, Ga., and Clarksdale, Miss.

Taliaferro Okayed on Integration

AUGUSTA, Ga. (UPI)—U. S. District Court Monday relieved State School Supt. Jack Nix as receiver of the Taliaferro County school syste mand agreed to a Taliaferro plan for complete school integration.

Jack Nix

The court also strongly chided the U.S. Office of Education for its refusal to grant funds for remedial work with Taliaferro Negro students.

"This is a small school system in a place far remote from Washington, and the court does not know why these funds have been withheld...," the court opinion read, adding that the Taliaferro students are being "irreparably hurt" by the lack of remedial opportunities.

The court based its dismissal of Nix as receiver on the fact that the Taliaferro County Board of Education had agreed to integrate completely its school system by opening only one high school and one elementary school for both Negro and white pupils.

All except one Negro school was closed down in Taliaferro County last fall when all white students transferred to neighboring Warren, Wilkes and Greene counties to avoid integration.

The court praised Nix, saying that he "has done all that he can possibly do toward carrying out the order of the court."

In a brief filed earlier with the court, Nix pointed out that Negro Taliaferro transfers were "earning considerably lower grades and have a much higher rate of failure than the white students." He told the court that federal remedial funds were denied for work with these Negro pupils.

COURT RULE ASKED FOR SCHOOL CASES

U.S. Seeks Standard Guide for Southern Integration

Special to The New York Times

NEW ORLEANS, May 24 — A three-judge panel of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals began hearing today a petition by the Department of Justice for a uniform decree to speed school desegregation in many Southern school systems.

It also heard arguments from lawyers for Negro plaintiffs that the petition did not go far enough.

Federal courts should require boards to desegregate student bodies by geographic zoning and to desegregate faculties through specific policies. The building of all-white and all-Negro schools should also be stopped, the lawyers said.

The hearing, which will continue through tomorrow, amounted almost to a seminar on how to abolish school segregation in the South.

Lawyers for 12 Alabama and Louisiana school districts listened with plain dismay. They argued that present desgregation plans were working splendidly and should not be tampered with. Some of the lawyers argued only a few years ago that no desegregation at all should be imposed on their districts.

The Justice Department had intervened in cases involving seven of the 12 districts to ask for a uniform desegration decree. There is a gap between some court-ordered plans and those put forth by executive policy and more advanced judicial policy.

The department wants the judges to set up a model decree based on the 1966 desegregation guidelines of the Office of Education of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Lawyers for some of the school boards suggested rather pointedly that the court would be abdicating its judicial responsibility if it simply adopted the guidelines.

The department lawyers denied it.

"We are asking the court," said David Norman, an attorney in the department's Civil Rights Division, "to look at what's sensible in the H.E.W. guidelines and require school boards to use them."

The cases, which involve all the school suits pending in the Fifth Circuit, are being heard by Judges John Minor Wisdom of New Orleans and Homer Thornberry of Austin, Tex., both of the Fifth Circuit, and District Judge Harold Cox of Jackson, Miss. Judge Cox is sitting temporarily on the court because of vacancies there.

The department wants the court to require all school districts that are desegregating under court orders to follow the so-called freedom of choice plans that most Southern districts are using.

In theory, freedom of choice means that a student can go to any school he wishes.

However, lawyers for the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., argued today, as they have in the past, that freedom of choice does not work.

The plan puts the burden for desegregation on Negro students and parents, who are susceptible to intimidation, they contended.

Norman C. Amaker of New York, a lawyer for the fund, said:

"No reasonable man can expect them [Negroes] to apply in large numbers when the Klan is standing around trying to check the choice."

Mr. Amaker suggested that pupils be assigned to the schools nearest their homes, using attendance zones. He also suggested that school boards be required to fill all teacher vacancies with members of the other race until faculties are desegregated.

He said construction plans should be reviewed by district courts to stop the building of new schools for all-white and all-Negro populations.

William Q. Keenan of White Plains, N. Y., an attorney retained by the Congress of Racial Equality in a lawsuit against the school district of Monroe, La., asked the court to order a racial balance in the Monroe schools. That is the only way to assure equality of education he said.

He said free choice was not enough because of community pressures. Monroe, with a freedom-of-choice plan, has only five or six Negroes in previously all-white schools, he said.

"The school board gives white children a good education whether they want it or not." Mr. Keenan said. "It should do the same for Negroes."

The Justice Department petition made no specific recommendations on faculty desegregation, asking only for a general order removing race or color as a factor in hiring, assignment, promotion and dismissal.

The petition omitted one controversial section of the Office of Education guidelines. It said that a district was expected to double its percentage of Negroes in formerly all-white schools during the coming school year.

NOT SAME TO ALL PEOPLE

Guidelines prompt different reactions

MONTGOMERY, May 26 — Like most issues, the problem of school desegregation guidelines means different things to different people.

To city and county educational officials, they represent the frustration of attempting to satisfy conflicting interests at the local and state level on the one hand, and at the federal level on the other—and still come up with something that will qualify for continued U. S. funds.

To many legal minds in the South, the new guidelines—especially those calling for faculty desegregation and a racial quota system of pupil assignment—represent a violation of specific prohibitions against such actions in the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

STATE EDUCATIONAL officials fear the regulations adopted this year by the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare will mean the end of Alabama's local school systems, since they take away the power of local boards to hire and assign teachers.

And to a once-removed gubernatorial candidate named George C. Wallace, the 1966 HEW guidelines have become a prime political issue that will keep things lively between now and the November general election.

Word has quietly filtered down from Washington that political motivations also exist at the national level—there will be no official backdown on the guidelines for fear of offending the Negro vote.

ON THE OTHER hand, Alabama officials both in Montgomery and Washington believe the new regulations will not be rigidly enforced, especially the two sections most objectionable to Alabama and other southern states.

At least one veteran member of the Alabama congressional delegation has sent word that school systems will continue to receive federal funds if they file Civil Rights Act compliance forms which omit the requirements for faculty desegregation and the quota system on pupil assignment.

However, some Alabama officials are warning that approval of the modified guidelines won't come immediately. They expect the U. S. Office of Education to voice loud threats that funds will be cut off unless faculties are desegregated, then quietly subside without taking punitive action against systems which have already made starts at desegregation of students.

Included in that category, according to State Superintendent of Education Austin R. Meadows, are 115 of Alabama's 118 school systems.

"AS FAR AS we know," Meadows said Wednesday, "the only systems not in compliance at present are Bibb County, Tarrant City, and Mountain Brook. Furthermore, Tarrant City and Mountain Brook didn't even attempt to qualify. They are not interested in federal funds."

The other Alabama school systems are either desegregating under court order or began permitting members of both races in their classrooms last fall under the 1965 HEW guidelines, or agreed to do so.

Most of the 115 systems which are currently receiving federal funds allowed Negroes to enter formerly white schools on a freedom of choice plan.

The proposals they submitted last fall call for further desegregation during the next school year, but don't include faculties.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., June 3 (UPI) — Eighteen university and college presidents of Alabama met with Gov. George C. Wallace today and endorsed his opposition to the Federal Government's school desegregation guidelines.

A statement, issued after the closed conference, urged resistance to the guidelines and said that the educators "are shocked and amazed by the illegal guidelines proposed by the (Federal) Department of Health, Education and Welfare."

Another meeting, between Mr. Wallace and superintendents of county and city boards of education, was called by the Governor for Monday. The president of Auburn University and the vice president of the University of Alabama met with Mr. Wallace earlier as did members of Alabama's Congressional delegation.

"These illegal guidelines, which go far beyond the letter and spirit of the law," the statement said, "Threaten the ultimate destruction of the public education system of the state of Alabama and the nation and are a further attack on states rights and local government by an irresponsible federal bureaucracy.

Opposition Advocated

"We go on record as opposing the so-called guidelines and urge all public officials who are affected in any way by this threat to our educational system to use every method at their disposal within the law to fight against attempted encroachment on the basic right of the people of Alabama and the United States to operate their own public school systems.

McCOMB — A team of Justice Department investigators took depositions Friday about operation of a McComb area private school in a lawsuit filed by Mississippi Negroes.

Harry L. Marsalis, treasurer, and Harold A. Thompson, chairman of the board of directors of Southwest Mississippi Christian Academy near McComb were interrogated.

Lawyers on the opposite side from the federal attorneys were Earl Thomas of Jackson and Hardy Lott of Greenwood. Associated with them in the statewide case, but not present at the McComb hearing, is Semmes Luckett of Clarksdale.

Lot said the deposition hearing resulted from a plea by Mississippi Negroes for the federal court to enjoin Mississippi from paying tuition grants to parents of children attending numerous white private schools in the state. The Delta lawyer said the government intervened to handle the Negroes case Lott. Thomas and Luckett were employed as counsel for the several private white schools involved in the lawsuit.

Opening questions to Marsalis and Thompson, whose depositions were taken simultantaneuosly, related to any possible connection between what the federal lawyer called "the White Citizens Council" and

Counties Lose Federal Funds

3 Georgia Systems, 15 Others Failed to Comply with Guidelines

The U.S. Office of Education announced Saturday it will move to cut off federal funds to three Georgia school districts for failure to comply with desegregation guidelines.

The action, affecting Sumter, Camden and Seminole counties, is the first under the tough new desegregation guidelines issued last March.

Education officials in each of the three counties indicated Saturday night they would not seek to comply with the new regulations and were willing to forgo a total of about $500,000 in federal financing.

At the same time the Office of Education said it will seek to stop the flow of federal dollars to 15 other school districts in Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina.

In addition, Harold Howe II, U.S. commissioner of education, sent a stiff telegram to Alabama's superintendent of education warning that the state will lose more federal education funds if school districts withdraw their voluntary assurances of compliance.

MR. HOWE said, "It has come to my attention that school districts in Alabama are being urged by state officials to withdraw voluntary compliance assurances . . ." If this is done, Mr. Howe asserted, "districts which are not in compliance will have federal funds for new projects deferred."

None of the boards of education in the three Georgia counties have signed Form 441B, the certification of intent to comply with the new guidelines.

"We feel that we are in compliance as much as anyone else in Georgia," said Sumter County School Supt. Edward N. Bailey. The county board has approved a freedom of choice plan.

Although Sumter schools were not desegregated this year, Mr. Bailey said a "good number" of pupils have been accepted for transfer next September, including Negro youths seeking transfer to previously all-white schools.

"In my conversations with Washington they keep bugging us with percentages," the Sumter superintendent added. "The figure 10 per cent keeps coming up and this is why we haven't signed."

"WE FEEL that the guidelines go farther than the law requires," Mr. Bailey asserted. "We don't think percentages should enter into it in any way whatsoever."

The loss of funds could amount to approximately $300,000 in the 1966-67 school year, the Sumter official said. "We have already tentatively approved a budget for next year that did not include federal funds in it," he commented. Mr. Bailey said he could not say how many Sumter students have applied for transfers because "Washington has said they didn't want these numbers divulged to the press."

Seminole School Supt. N. P. Malcom said he had the same troubles with Office of Education statements about a quota of 10 per cent desegregated classroom attendance next year.

The Seminole County Board of Education did not sign the compliance form because "we knew 10 per cent here was impossible unless you had forced integration, and our board is not going to have anything to do with forced integration."

FREEDOM of choice in selecting schools was offered for the last two school years, but there was no desegregation in Seminole, Mr. Malcom stated.

If the federal allotment for 1966-67 was to have been in the same proportion as this year, the county stands to lose about $200,000, Mr. Malcom added.

"I've been working on that budget (for next year) this week," the Seminole superintendent stated. "The budget is not complete, but we are not counting on federal funds."

Dr. A. J. Bauknecht, chairman of the Camden County Board of Education, said Saturday night his group has made "no attempt" to comply with the new guidelines.

The board has met several times to discuss the compliance issue, but has never taken a vote, Dr. Bauknecht said.

"I believe it was the board's consensus that we were in compliance last year in a legal response to the civil rights law," the Camden board chairman commented.

Four Negro students attended Camden County High during the 1965-66 school year under a freedom of choice plan.

Camden stands to lose some $4,000 in salary funds and approximately $90,000 in other aid programs, Dr. Bauknecht said. "The board meets again Tuesday, but I doubt if there will be much progress (on compliance)," he added.

SO FAR 42 Southern school districts have lost federal funds because they did not comply with desegregation guidelines.

U.S. Education Office Violates Law, Nix Says

AC 6/11/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Office of Education is operating "in flagrant violation" of the law and is using "federal policemen to badger boards of education with a multiplicity of ambiguous guidelines," Georgia school Supt. Jack Nix charged Friday.

Nix testified before a Senate subcommittee, headed by Sen. Sam Ervin, D.-N.C., which is holding hearings on the 1966 Civil Rights bill.

The state superintendent also accused the Office of Education of discriminating against children in Taliaferro County by withholding federal funds after a U.S. district court had approved a desegregation plan.

Nix, who is seeking election to his first full term as state superintendent, said, "I believe the opinion of the majority of system superintendents and boards of education in Georgia is that the desegregation guidelines recently issued by the U.S. Office of Education are outside the scope and intent of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

"In fact, the requirement for racial balance in the mandatory transfer provisions are in flagrant violation of the act itself."

Nix continued, "The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is now a fact.

Nix Blasts Office of Education

Our people are gradually moving into an acceptance of its intent. Eventually, if patience is manifested, its intent and Georgia's phiolosophy of public school education can be reconciled and effectuated.

MORE WISELY

"It does seem to me, though, that if the federal government is actually interested in the instruction of children, it could more wisely spend the available money for the instruction of children rather than for federal policemen to badger boards of education with a multiplicity of ambiguous guidelines."

Nix said the Office of Education does not follow the law when it "defers" new federal funds prior to a hearing on complaints of racial discrimination against school systems.

The superintendent said the federal officials refused to approve a court-ordered desegregation plan for Taliaferro County and withheld $74,000 from the system. "It seems to me this was an act of discrimination on the part of the U.S. Office of Education against the very children who were in most need of assistance."

BACKS ERVIN

Nix endorsed amendments proposed by Sen. Ervin to prevent the federal government from withholding funds before a hearing is held and to state specifically that racial balance is not required for schools.

President Lyndon B. Johnson and U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe have said the guidelines do not call for racial balance.

Mrs. Frankie Freeman of St. Louis, a member of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, cited several events in Georgia school systems as reason for passage of a stronger law to prevent intimidation of Negroes as a result of school desegregation.

FOUND FEAR

Mrs. Freeman told the subcommittee that the Civil Rights Commission has found "that fear, intimidation and harassment of Negro parents are still substantial deterents to desegregation of the South."

She said, "For example, in one county in Georgia, bottles, stones, toilet paper and paint were thrown at the homes of a family whose daughter was one of the first four Negro children to attend the county high school which formerly had been all white . . ."

Mrs. Freeman added, "The mother of a Negro student who selected a white school in Sumter County, Ga., was fired from her job as a maid within 24 hours after submission of the choice form . . .

"Evictions of Negro families enrolling their children in previously all-white schools have been reported in Thomas County, Ga., and Marigold, Miss.

"Parents of such children have been reported threatened with or actually subjected to, job loss in Baker County and Waynesboro, Ga., Rolling Fork, Aguilla and West Point, Miss., and Demopolis, Ala."

Sounds funds warning

U. S. declares it will stand by guidelines

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

B'ham NEWS 6/11/66

BY JAMES CHISUM, News staff writer

U. S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II today stoutly declared he will stand firm on 1966 guidelines for school desegregation.

The commissioner denied allegations that the guidelines are illegal and said they're supported well by court decisions. He also denied charges that the guidelines are intended to promote "racial balance" or to take over the authority of local school boards to hire, fire, demote or promote teachers.

Howe warned that court-ordered desegregation may result in an interruption of the flow of federal funds to a school district as well as eventual integration.

And he said the children of a state where non-compliance with the guidelines is encouraged will suffer and so would the economy of the state in the long run.

HIS VIEWS WERE revealed in a speech before educators, civil rights workers and others at Birmingham's Tutwiler Hotel. The meeting, at which Howe was the keynote speaker, was sponsored by the Alabama State Advisory Committee to the Civil Rights Commission.

Howe received a standing ovation when he was introduced to the predominately Negro audience. An extremely small number of white school officials were present, perhaps as few as two or three superintendents. An U. S. Civil Service Commission spokesman had said earlier that 19 Alabama local school superintendents had pre-registered.

Officials said the auditorium at the Tutwiler was furnished with 1,100 seats, all of which were filled within a short time after the meeting opened.

A news conference was scheduled by Howe during the day.

"I hope that there is no misunderstanding of our position," Howe told the assembly, continuing:

"The Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the Office of Education as one of its constituent agencies, are going to adhere to the proceedings and policies established in the law.

"My staff and I regard these matters as our legal responsibility, and we have the full support of Secretary John Gardner in this view.

THE COMMISSIONER conceded that court cases to test the legality of the guidelines haven't yet been decided. But, he said, the department was careful to follow the law and previous court decisions in preparing them.

"Health, Education and Welfare and Justice Department lawyers meticulously studied the law and researched an array of federal court decisions.

"They agreed that the principles and procedures embraced in the guidelines were based on firm legal ground found in the Civil Rights Act, court decisions and HEW regulations. I can assure you that a great deal of competent legal thinking went into their preparation.

"The phrase 'correction of racial imbalance' refers to the bussing of children from neighborhood schools which have not been officially segregated but which—because of residential patterns—are 'racially imbalanced.' The Office of Education guidelines do not bear on this situation at all," he said.

The commissioner said the guidelines don't try to usurp the personnel authority of school boards.

"Let it be absolutely clear . . . that our 1966 guidelines do not require that every school must have a bi-racial faculty by next fall.

"THEY DO not establish a fixed formula for staff desegregation, nor do they tell school administrators what people they may hire and which they may fire.

"They do say this: That all personnel decisions . . . must be made without regard to race, color or national origin except to correst past discrimination. And they say there must be real and not merely token progress in staff desegregation," he said.

The portion of the guidelines requiring staff desegregation has been attacked as contrary to a section of the Civil Rights Act which says it won't apply to certain employment practices. Howe said the guidelines require faculty desegregation as a necessary part of desegregating the entire school system and not as a device to regulate employment.

"The desegregation process must involve faculty assignments or it simply will be

"We face these court tests with complete confidence. While they are in process, we shall continue with the policies expressed in the guidelines unless a court ruling requires otherwise," he said.

HOWE SAID THE 1966 guidelines are based on principles set forth in the 1965 guidelines, which most Alabama school systems accepted, and merely call for the "normal second step."

The commissioner said the two basic requirements of the guidelines are that desegregation plans, of whatever type, must work and that in the case of free choice plans that there indeed be a free choice.

"In the guideline requirements covering free choice plans, certain percentages are cited for the transfer of students, the purpose being to give schools a suggested standard for meeting their legal responsibilities to desegregate."

" . . . They are simply an effort, based on numerous requests for guidance from local school authorities, to establish broad measures of progress for eliminating the dual school system and to indicate whether or not a free choice plan is working.

"Clearly such a plan is not producing desegregation if it continues to maintain Negro schools with all Negro students and white schools with white students.

" . . . IF A FREE choice plan does not approximate the minimum desegregation according to the percentage listed, that is a signal that we had better take a close look at this plan to determine whether it is operating freely and effectively," he said.

Howe said it is "just not the case" that the guidelines are intended to "overcome racial imbalance," activity prohibited by the Civil Rights Act.

"The guidelines do in fact require that reasonable progress be made, but nowhere do they require that there be any particular proportion of Negro and white children in any particular school.

"The phrase 'correction of racial imbalance' refers to the bussing of children from neighborhood schools which have not been officially segregated but which—because of residential patterns—are 'racially imbalanced.' The Office of Education guidelines do not bear on this situation at all," he said.

Howe said the guidelines require faculty desegregation as a necessary part of desegregating the entire school system and not as a device to regulate employment.

"The desegregation process must involve faculty assignments or it simply will be meaningless . . . I cannot imagine that anyone would quarrel with the statement that the existence of an all-Negro faculty in a school clearly signals that this school is intended for Negro students and therefore constitutes the practice of discrimination," he said.

"In our guidelines, we are not talking about fair employment practices. We are talking about eliminating segregated school situations, and that requires the elimination of the practice of making faculty assignments that place Negro teachers in one school and white teachers in another," he continued.

Referring to cases now being considered by the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, Howe said "We expect that the rulings in these cases will leave scant comfort for those school districts which see court order compliance as the easy way out of meeting their desegregation responsibilities."

HE SAID any district, if it wishes, can wait for a court order before desegregating.

"Necessarily, however, it will find itself subject to withholding of all federal funds until it can get a court order operating as the result of a suit brought by local complainants," he said.

Howe said the clinging of school districts to segregation when it is clearly prohibited by the law of the land "threatens the opportunities of children to receive the best possible education."

"I might add that where such a position is encouraged on a statewide basis, the result is to create a threat of denial of opportunity to young people which is tragic — tragic in the limitations it imposes on the opportunities of individuals and tragic also because its long range influence would clearly work to diminish the prosperity and econmic opportunities of the state.

"I might also add that such a position makes it infinitely more difficult for responsible school officials to exercise local initiative in carrying out their responsibilities under the law," he said.

School Aides and Civil Rights Leaders Urge Integration

NYT 6/18/66

By M. A. FARBER

School officials and laymen from across the country were told yesterday that education for Negroes is "one long disaster area" that must be radically improved for the sake of whites as well as Negroes.

Civil rights leaders and educators, speaking to 350 persons at the Roosevelt Hotel, declared that the future of American democracy was threatened by the existence of segregated and second-rate education.

They exhorted school administrators attending a conference sponsored by the National Urban League and Teachers College of Columbia University to eliminate Negro colonialism in America" by quickly and effectively integrating the nation's school system.

Participating in the two-day conference, which ends today, are school superintendents, presidents of boards of education and Urban League members from 75 cities.

Dr. John H. Fischer, president of Teachers College, asserted that "the Negro child must be educated in a school where it is clear not only to him but to everybody else that he is not segregated and where his undisputed right to membership is acknowledged by his peers and by his elders of both races."

Dr. Fischer conceded that school integration "will be more effective when parallel improvements are made in the housing, the economic opportunities and the general condition" of Negroes. But, he said, "the absence of adequate effort elsewhere only increases the urgency that prompt and energetic action be taken by the school.

"Any school system that subjects part of its children to the repression and indignity of ghetto schools while others are given the stimulation and security of a sound school environment is only accumulating further trouble for the future," he warned.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, indicted the "school establishment itself" as "one of the great barriers to desegregation."

The Negro community, he said, "is skeptical of the school community."

He noted that every school in Watts, a Negro area of Los Angeles that was recently torn by riots, is on double session.

"People there act like savages because they haven't had an opportunity to act like human beings," he concluded.

Wilkins Is Scornful

Wilkins spoke scornfully of a situation where "kids are being taught French when they don't know English."

But he drew laughter when he reminded the audience of a cartoon in which two youths are crossing a campus and one asks the other, "Is you did your French?"

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, appealed to the current educators to "undo what your forefathers have done."

That Negroes will not acquiesce in delay was emphasized by Miss June Shagaloff, national education director of the N.A.A.C.P.

"The Negro Community," she said in a written statement, "will continue to demand—at the polls, at the negotiating table, in the courts and in the streets, if necessary—that the public school establishment stop marking time and do something of substance about its problems."

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Howe Hits Integration Lag, 'Blind Faith in Gradualism'

Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON, June 18 — The nation's top education official said Saturday that American schools are "almost as segregated today as they were in 1954" and he criticized the "well-intentioned timidity" of school administrators.

It was the toughest and bluntest speech yet delivered by U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe II since he took office six months ago.

Howe's speech inspired a standing ovation at the Columbia University conference at whcih he spoke. The New York forum was sponsored by the National Urban League and Columbia Teachers College.

He called upon school officials "to form a third front for racial equality in the United States" and scorned "gentlemanly discussions" and "a blind faith in gradualism."

"CONSIDERING the authority that we gentlemanly education officials have at our command to correct racial injustice in our schools, I feel that we have accomplished very little so far."

He said the educators should either "stop pretending we care about racial equality, or we should step down from our air conditioned podiums and start something definite in the way of a program."

There have been enough committee reports on the inequalities of segregated education to build a paper "tower of Babel," Howe continued.

"While we have gone on urging moderation, sweet reason, and bigger and better panel discussions, the schools throughout the nation remain almost as segregated today as they were in 1954, when the supreme court decided that racial segregation was illegal."

School officials have both the leadership role and the knowledge to get the job done, Howe said. What they have often lacked is a "productive commitment." Something more is needed "than the grinding of our corporate teeth," he said.

"OUR WORDS have urged the nation to desegregate its schools. But our reluctance to act has said even louder, not yet.' Somehow we seem to have been lulled into a blind faith in gradualism, a mindless confidence that some morning, some year, a suddenly transformed electorate will decide that this is the day to integrate America."

It isn't going to happen that way, Howe went on. And there's no point in waiting for real estate salesmen to voluntarily set up open housing policies or waiting for "mayors and city councils to do the work they hired us to do."

TRIP STAMPED OUT

MIAMI, June 18 (UPI)—For a long time, John Duffy and his wife Dorothy carefully collected enough trading stamps to fill 1,228 books for an all-expense paid 21-day European vacation listed in the stamp company catalogue.

But when they went down to the redemption center the couple was told they couldn't have the trip.

The stamp company—Triple S. Blue Stamps, Inc., of South Hackensack, N.J.,—said the stamps were only good if the saver gets them himself through the purchase of merchandise. To save 1,228 books, the company pointed out, one would have to make $200,000 in purchases.

Duffy asked for and got a hearing before State Comptroller Fred Dickinson. The hearing was continued. The company said it wanted time to determine exactly how Duffy got the stamps.

EDUCATORS TOLD INTEGRATION FAILS

SCHOOL DESEG

Howe Says at Parley Here School Aides Must Risk Jobs in Drive on Bias

NYT 6/19/63

By M. S. HANDLER

School desegregation in the nation has proved a dismal failure, United States Education Commissioner Harold Howe 2d, told educators and school administrators of 76 cities here yesterday. The time has come, he said, for educators to put their own careers on the line to compel their communities to integrate their educational systems.

The two principal approaches to school desegregation, gradualism and activism, have failed to accomplish school desegregation, he said, and it is time for school officials to create their own "third front" for racial equality in American education.

The Commissioner delivered his assessment at the final session of a two-day conference of school administrators, co-sponsored by the National Urban League and Teachers College of Columbia University under a grant from the United States Office of Education. The conference was held at the Roosevelt Hotel.

Mr. Howe told the educators that after he had heard of the shooting of James H. Meredith in Mississippi, "I started to wonder whether civil rights was any place for a gentlemanly discussion.

"I am beginning to suspect that it is not; in any case, I have the feeling that those of us who think of ourselves as gentlemen should either stop pretending that we care about racial equality, or we should step down from our air-conditioned podiums and start something definite in the way of a program."

He continued:

"We have, to be sure, gotten a fair amount of newspaper space and published enough committee reports on the inequalities of segregated education to bulid a paper Tower of Babel. Nothing is safer these days than denouncing bigotry. But I find myself puzzling over which is worse, honest bigotry or well-intentioned timidity.

"While we have go on urging moderation, sweet reason and bigger and better panel discussions, the schools throughout the nation remain almost as segregated today as they were in 1954 when the Supreme Court decided that racially segregated education was illegal."

Mr. Howe said the small progress made in the South toward desegregation "has been offset by increasing de facto segregation in the cities in the North. "He said: The facts today are that a Negro youngster in an American elementary school has on the national average not much more than 15 per cent of his classmates from the majority white groups in; the Southern states the figure is nearer 5 per cent. White high school students can expect to have nine out of 10 of their classmates from their own white groups."

Moderation, Mr. Howe said, "has a great deal to be said for it, of course, especially by the moderates. I am reminded of the prayer that St. Augustine addressed to heaven when he was a young man. 'Oh, Lord,' he said, 'make me chaste. But not yet.'"

He continued:

"Our words have urged the nation to desegregate its schools. But our reluctance to act has said even louder, 'Not yet.' Somehow we seem to have been lulled into a blind faith in gradualism, a mindless confidence that some morning, some year, a suddenly transformed electorate will spontaneously and joyously decide that this is the day to integrate America.

"Well it's not going to happen. The majority of American whites display no likelihood of becoming enthusiastic about school desegregation and the changes it demands in the immediate future.

"Gradualism, no matter what we call it, has failed, and I think it is fair to say that those who continue to espouse it are fooling themselves and, in many ways, failing our nation. It seems to me time for school officials to form a third front for racial equality in the United States.

'A Sluggish Team'

"At one end of this civil rights movement today we have the gradualists, both white and Negro, a polite, sometimes sluggish team deeply respectful of the public and sometimes given to assuring each other that it is possible to make an omelet

Our words have urged the nation to desegregate its schools. But our reluctance to act has said even louder, 'Not yet.' Somehow we seem to have been lulled into a blind faith in gradualism, a mindless confidence that some morning, some year, a suddenly transformed electorate will spontaneously and joyously decide that this is the day to integrate America.

'A Sluggish Team'

"At one end of this civil rights movement today we have the gradualists, both white and Negro, a polite, sometimes sluggish team deeply respectful of the public and sometimes given to assuring each other that it is possible to make an omelet without breaking eggs. At the other end are the activists, who have come to feel that violence is the only way to get anything done.

"The failure of the gradualists would seem at bottom to be fear, fear of rocking the boat. The failure of the activists is that w hile they know in general terms what they want to achieve and are willing to pay a heavy price for it, they have neither the position in society nor the professional knowledge of the means and importance of advancing racial equality within the framework of law."

Mr. Howe suggested two main avenues of approach to make the schools of the central city so good that they would attract, not repel people, and to use every possible device to include within each school a cross-section of the social and economic background of the metropolis.

"A student should meet America in school, not a segregated segment of it," he said.

He continued:

"There is no such thing as the perfect way to achieve school desegregation. We must simply bore ahead with the tools we have, and it won't be pleasant, and it won't be quiet, and it would be much nicer if someone else would share this work.

"We are in the midst of a struggle for excellent education for every American youngster, and we must use every likely tool we can devise. Local school administrators must consider such means as redrawing school district boundaries and consolidating with neighboring districts for educational purposes, even though political boundaries may remain unchanged.

"We cannot wait for mayors and city councils to do the work they hired us to do. And sometimes we must do work they don't want us to do."

The Tash Ahead

"The load we must carry is that of irritating a fair percentage of our white constituents, of embarassing some governors and mayors, of alarming some newspaper publishers and of enraging suburban taxpayers, who, in proportion to the means, are not paying as much for their good schools as paupers in the city are paying for their bed ones.

"And all this means that, finally, and most grievously, we must run the risk of being invited to resign. Unless all of us are willing to put our jobs and our integrity on the line, we should admit that American educators are no longer prepared to be the prime movers in American education.

"American education today is perhaps the hottest room in our national house. But we picked it out all by ourselves. To paraphrase a metaphor, first wrought by President Truman, I would say that we must either adjust ourselves to the heat or let somebody else take over the kitchen."

Report Hits 'Ineptitude' In DeKalb

SCHOOL DESEG.
AC 6/27/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — A high-level, confidential report by the top Deep South official for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) accuses the U. S. Office of Education of using "scant" wisdom in enforcing Southern school desegregation.

The private memorandum written by William J. Page Jr., director of the regional HEW office in Atlanta, declared that any compromise on the new school guidelines will disable all federal desegregation efforts in the South.

The Office of Education, headed by Commissioner Harold Howe, is a branch of HEW.

"INEPTITUDE" CITED

One part of the memorandum said, "The ineptitude in handling the DeKalb County (Georgia) matter is unequaled in our experience."

Page wrote the two-page memorandum to top HEW officials in Washington after 18 Southern senators sent a letter to President Lyndon B. Johnson requesting him to use his executive powers to revoke school desegregation guidelines.

The regional director, contacted by telephone at his office in Atlanta, indicated that the memorandum was written before President Johnson rejected the request by the Southern senators.

Page refused to talk about statements in the memorandum.

"I'm dumbfounded that it got out," he declared.

ADDRESSED TO SECRETARY

Page's memorandum was addressed to HEW secretary John W. Gardner in Washington. It also was marked for the attention of Edmund Baxter, direction of HEW field coordination.

A reporter obtained a copy of the memorandum.

Page's memorandum began, "The regional staff and I are concerned about the possible outcomes of the 18 Southern senators' petition to abrogate the school desegregation guidelines.

"I wish to offer for your consideration the principal elements of a regional perspective. The senators are attempting to accomplish through pressure on the Executive Branch that which they cannot achieve in Congress.

"Unfortunately, they probably have a preponderance of Southern public opinion with them. But public opinion is changing and that positive shift should not be deterred by expedient response of the Executive Branch. The guidelines are legally sound and should not be compromised."

President Johnson said in his reply to Georgia Sen. Richard B. Russell, who wrote the letter sent by the Southern senators, that he thinks the guidelines are fair.

Page's memorandum continued, "Wisdom in their application is what we need most and have had in scant measure. For example, the ineptitude in handling the DeKalb County (Georgia) matter is unequaled in our experience.

"Local people and this regional office had attempted for a year to get this problem handled constructively by the Office of Education. Sadly, other performances nearly as ridiculous have occurred in other areas."

Local HEW officials this year refused to approve DeKalb County's desegregation plan as applied against the new guidelines, and they had attempted to negotiate a compliance agreement with School Supt. Jim Cherry.

Cherry, who runs the second largest school system in Georgia, objected to procedures used by local compliance officer Stan Kruger.

The DeKalb superintendent quit talking with Kruger and came to Washington, where he conferred for several hours with Howe in the commissioner's office.

Immediately after the long conference, Howe issued a letter that said the DeKalb problem arose from a misunderstanding and that the school system would be considered in compliance at that time.

Howe's letter to Cherry did not say what or who was responsible for the misunderstanding.

Page's memorandum went on, "Compliance cannot be achieved by efforts of personnel in Washington alone, regardless of their good intentions. They do not have and cannot get the local information and the sensitivity requisite to full compliance.

"Local people respond more positively to federal personnel stationed in the area than to personnel remotely stationed in Washington.

"Even if they could perform that function centrally, we cannot operate sensibly in the regional office — this one, particularly — without having immediate information and capacity for response.

"If any of the 2,000 school superintendents can negotiate his case with Commissioner Howe, why should 10,000 hospital administrators not have direct access to the surgeon-general?

"The senators' petition, and the general fulmination of protest, is as much a product of mishandling opportunities as it is reflection of the statutory requirement.

"Consideration of civil rights pervades everything we do in this region. If the school guidelines are compromised, we will

Page said he had intended the memorandum as a "private communication to my boss, and it was not intended to be made public."

The regional director at first refused to say when the memorandum was sent to Gardner.

A reporter pointed out that Page would be placed in the position of accusing the President even though he rejected the senators' plea if it should be assumed that his memorandum was written after Johnson sent his reply to Russell.

"I'm not aware that the President has answered," said Page. "I still don't know that he replied. This communication was sent some time ago. Soon after the petition (by the Southerners) was sent."

He added, "I can find out in five minutes when that was written, but I won't. I hope you won't assume it was after the President had given his reply. That would put your story off base.

"I don't second-guess the President and the Secretary (Gardner). Whatever the president and the secretary decided, we will comply with.

N.E.A Directors Urge Merger With Negro Group in the South

SCHOOL DESEG. NYT 6/27/66

By M. A. FARBER

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI BEACH, June 26—The board of directors of the 986,000-member National Education Association today unanimously recommended a merger with the American Teachers Association, a Negro professional organization. Final approval for the unification is expected Tuesday from the N.E.A.'s delegate assembly.

The board's action, which follows several years of talks between the two teacher groups, came on the first day of the N.E.A.'s 104th annual convention. The convention will close Friday. The American Teachers Association, which has 32,000 members, sanctioned national ties with the N.E.A. at its own meeting here Friday, in effect dissolving itself. The organization, which draws its members from the South, will go out of existence with the unification.

Already about 90 per cent of its Negro teachers hold dual membership in the N.E.A., but until recently they could not belong to the N.E.A.'s all-white affiliates in 11 Southern states and had to maintain all-Negro state and local groups in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

The situation changed markedly this year as the white affiliates in all 11 states but Louisiana removed bans against Negroes. What is more, plans for integration of the white and Negro groups in eight states have been received by the N.E.A. and well be examined this week by its executive committee.

The white state affiliates acted this year under orders from the national organization. The N.E.A. told the 11 state groups that they would have to open their membership rolls and also offer state merger plans by July 1, 1966.

A question no wbefore the National Education Association—one that could start considerable debate here this week—is what action to take against the state affiliates that have complied with only the first mandate or, in the case of Louisiana, neither mandate.

Some indication that the N.E.A. might not be so punitive as to suspend or expel state affiliates came this morning when Richard Batchelder of Newtonville, Mass., outgoing president, said that "more progress than was thought humanly possible" had been made with the Southern problem.

He pointed out at a news conference, in reply to a question whether the N.E.A. was dragging its feet, that "its been a long time since Abraham Lincoln and Boston has more de facto segregation than it had 10 years ago." Southern white groups, he said, had "agonizing decisions to make under tremendous pressure."

The impending unification of the National Education Association and the American Teachers Association was hailed as "a dramatic historic event" by Riago J. Martin, president of the Negro organization.

Educators' Group Weighs Integration Of Southern Units

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI BEACH, June 28—The major concern at the convention of the National Education Association continues to be the rift between those who want quick racial integration of the association's Southern affiliates and those who are urging patience and restraint.

The association has separate white and Negro affiliates in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Leading the demand for integration of the affiliates by June 1, 1967, is the National Committee of Educators for Human Rights. But the hierarchy of the N.E.A. considers that date as unrealistic.

The committee is represented here by some 200 young delegates from large cities, suburban areas and the South.

At a news conference today, its president, Pat Tornillo of Florida, called it "an action group for N.E.A. legislation, attempting to bring change more rapidly than is normally done."

The group is not an official arm of the association, but a number of influential delegates and N.E.A. staff members contend that it could provide the impetus for sweeping alterations of association politics and programs.

The association, which is meeting at Convention Hall, represents 986,000 teachers.

The committee, which has chapters in 16 states, has sponsored strong resolutions calling for the elimination of de facto segregation in the North, for "human and professional" rights of teachers, and for integration of dual associations in the South.

Top U.S. Aide Calls School Administrators Too 'Timid'

NYT 7/1/66

By M. A. FARBER

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI BEACH, June 30 — A top official of the United States Office of Education said here today that he did not "have much faith" that school administrators would lead the way toward desegregation of the nation's classrooms.

David Seeley, director of the office's Equal Opportunities Division, told 200 delegates to the National Education Association convention that administrators were too "timid" and too closely "attached" to local political authority to assume the necessary leadership. The teachers themselves will have to be in the vanguard, Mr. Seeley asserted.

His division oversees compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits the use of Federal funds for racially segregated facilities and programs.

The director called desegregation both a legal and an educational problem but said "it is the schools and educators that hold the key" to its solution. "What they do will decide whether we succeed or whether we just make a mess of ourselves," he said.

Slow Faculty Progress

Prior to Mr. Seeley's talk at the Barcelona Hotel, Eddie Morris of Kentucky State College reported that faculty desegregation in Southern public schools had proceeded slowly, where it proceeded at all.

Mr. Morris, a member of a study team from the N.E.A. and the United States Office of Education, said that Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, Florida and Texas were "beginning to make an honest effort to comply with the Supreme Court decision of 1954."

But, he noted, "there is little faculty desegregation in these states."

In Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia, "there is little student desegregation and even less faculty desegregation" Mr. Morris said.

He charged that where Negro schools had been closed or reduced in size because of integration, Negro teachers had been dismissed from the school system or downgraded in rank and responsibility. The study team discovered 688 such cases between May and September 1965, he said.

Extremism Assailed

In another panel discussion today, extremism, from the Left or the Right, was roundly condemned.

Mrs. Jennelle Moorhead of Eugene, Ore., president of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, declared that "the far Right, the radical Right, remains a clear present and persistent danger to schools and democracy."

"With insidious and subtle tactics it continues to infiltrate democratic organizations and seeks to capture strategic positions from which it can dominate and control our schools," Mrs. Moorhead said.

Last year, she noted, the P. T. A. lost some 80,000 members, and part of the reason, she added, was "the impact of the far Right's lie, distortion, hate and fear campaigns."

In another talk, Edwin W. Davis, associate secretary of the N. E. A.'s professional rights and responsibilities committee, scored "the two-headed monster of far Left and far Right."

Cogen Skeptical of Merger

CHICAGO June 30 (UPI)—The president of the American Federation of Teachers said today he is "a little skeptical" about an offer to merge with the larger National Education Association.

Charles Cogen told newsmen the offer by the retiring N.E.A. president, Richard Batchelder, two days ago to form "one common front for the improvement of the teaching profession" was a good idea—except for the suggestion that the A. F. T. "sever its ties" with the A. F. L.-C. I. O.

"We in the A. F. T. know that our affiliation with the A. F. L.-C. I. O. is a great asset in our pursuit of this objective," he said. "No organization dominated by out-of-classroom school administrators and standing aloof from the rest of organized society can possibly achieve it."

Business Executive Scores 'Suffocating' State Taxes

WASHINGTON (UPI) — State taxing bodies are "barraging manufacturers with indiscriminate taxes and suffocating amounts of paper work," a business executive told a special Congressional panel.

Werner N. Davidson, a director and secretary-treasurer of Caloric Corporation gas range and appliance maker, said in the last four years the number of returns his company has had to file increased from 999 to 1,363 and the cost of preparing the average return went from $70 to $110.

De Facto School Segregation Fought in Capital Suit

By BEN A. FRANKLIN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 18 — A Federal appeals judge began hearing today a suit that lawyers described as the first major attack on de facto pupil discrimination in a large American city. The suit is against the public school system in the District of Columbia.

At root, the suit is an attempt to have the Federal courts declare that de facto school segregation is just as discriminatory and unconstitutional as the deliberate, legislated segregation struck down by the United States Supreme Court 12 years ago.

If the courts accept this argument, one possible remedy would be a merger of predominantly Negro urban school systems with those of the predominantly white suburbs. In some of the largest cities there are not enough white students left to accomplish citywide integration by any other method.

De facto segregation in schools is segregation that results from housing patterns. It exists particularly in big cities.

Significant Gain Seen

Spokesmen for the Negro plaintiffs—a group of 18 parents and children and one teacher—said that a victory in their suit would represent "an advance as significant for the country as Brown v. Board of Education."

Brown v. the Board of Education of Topeka, Kan., was one of the five original school desegregation cases decided for the Negro plaintiffs in the Supreme Court's historic opinion of May 17, 1954. The school board here was also a defendant in that decision.

The Court's ruling then held that legal and administrative manifestations of discrimination against Negroes in the public schools constituted an unconstitutional denial of equal protection of the law and a denial of due process of law.

In Hobson V. Hansen, the case begun here today, the Federal courts are being asked to declare equally unconstitutional the "denial on account of race and color . . . of educational opportunities, advantages and facilities . . . Equal to those afforded and available to white children."

The suit is based on the Fifth Amendment guarantee against the deprivation of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

The suit is expected to go to the United States Supreme Court for final determination.

The District of Columbia's school population of about 180,000 children is 93 per cent Negro, and the percentage of Negroes is increasing.

The 14-page complaint, filed last January by William M. Kunstler of New York, one of the country's most active civil rights lawyers, alleges that Dr. Carl F. Hansen, the Superintendent of Schools here, his staff and the city's school board, have "intentionally" discriminated against Washington's Negro students by means of the following:

Associated Press
Judge J. Skelly Wright is officiating in the case.

¶The controversial "track system" under which pupils here at elementary and secondary school levels are placed in groupings according to ability. The greatest controversy has surrounded the assignment of many disadvantaged Negro children to the "basic" track. The other groupings are "general," "college preparatory" and "honors."

¶Providing the city's few all-white or predominantly white schools with superior "plant, equipment, materials and curricula" and, in the case of some white schools, matching with public school board funds the private contributions of white parents for additional equipment and supplies.

¶Refusing to appoint and dismissing from "high administrative and policy-making positions in the District School System qualified Negroes, solely on account of their race and color.

¶Redrawing public school boundaries "so as to separate, segregate and exclude the infant by [Negro] plaintiffs . . . from those schools."

¶Refusing or Neglecting to demand from Congress, which governs this non-self-governing Federal enclave, adequate appropriations to stem "the decline of the quality of the . . . public school system . . . thereby purposely and wilfully creating racial discrimination and segregation in the public schools."

¶Failing, for all of these reasons, to prevent discrimination "based on economic poverty and deprivation."

Suburban Comparison

The complaint thus contends that white students here are receiving a better education under better conditions than ar Negro students.

The complaint also alleges that Negroes in Washington are receiving educational opportunities inferior to those offered in the contiguous school jurisdiction of Maryland and Virginia.

This was considered significant in view of the probability that a suburban merger remed will be sought by the plaintiffs if the suit is upheld in the lower court.

The suit here was originally brought by Julius W. Hobson, a Negro economist for the Social Security Administration and the leader of a militant Washington civil rights group called ACT.

His initial aim was to challenge the constitutionality of the school board itself on grounds that its members are appointed by the judges of the United District Court here rather than elected.

18 Judges Ruled Out

This contention remai nsin the complaint and has caused unusual judicial complications. Because all 18 judges of the District Court for the District of Columbia are defendants in Mr. Hobson's suit, none of them could try the case.

Instead, the suit is being heard by Judge J. Skelly Wright of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Judge Wright, a former Federal district judge in New Orleans, is regarded as a liberal.

In a lecture at New York University School of Law in February, 1965, Judge Wright declared that "it is inconceivable that the Supreme Court will long sit idly by watching Negro children crowded into inferior sl umschools while the whites flee to the suburbs to place their children in vastly superior, predominantly white schools."

Judge Wright suggested that the Court might require the merger of urban and suburban school systems to achieve an areawide racial balance.

In the opening testimony before Judge Wright today, Dr. Hansen acknowledged under questioning by Mr. Kunstler that at least 13 elementary schools here still had all-white teaching staffs.

Byrd School Case Conceded by U.S.

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 7/23/66

By ACHSAH NESMITH
Constitution Staff Writer

COLUMBUS, Ga.—Justice Department attorneys agreed Friday to a federal judge's order that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare could not require a school board to transfer Negro children to a white school against their will.

In fact, the Washington attorneys declared that if a school board did so it on its own "might" be a violation of the Civil Rights Act and HEW guidelines for school desegregation.

No one seemed more surprised at the statements than the usually stony-faced U.S. District Judge J. Robert Elliott unless it was gubernatorial candidate Garland Byrd, who filed the suit.

"We accomplished more than we'd hoped to accomplish," Byrd said of the consent order. He called it "a victory for all the people of Georgia."

"It plain guts the guidelines," he added later. Byrd said he had tried to keep his suit and candidacy separate but said he didn't think the victory would hurt his campaign any. His followers were so jubilant they almost burst with smiles.

"This will be the turning point," they said.

Although the immediate effect will simply be six fewer Negro students in previously all-white Taylor County High School than the board had planned, Byrd said the decision would have ramifications on bussing fights all over the country, and directly affect a number of Georgia systems immediately. Taylor County will have eight Negroes in previously white schools this fall, anyway, who asked for transfer.

Justice Department attorney Brian Landsberg disagreed with

Byrd School Case Conceded by U.S.

Byrd's assessment, saying unequivocally, "This doesn't have anything to do with bussing."

BYRD DISPUTED

Landsberg disputed Byrd's contention that a Justice Department official had told the Taylor County Board it would have to transfer some Negro students who had asked to remain in the all-Negro R. L. McDougald High School, or lose federal funds.

Byrd brought the suite contending such directives violated the Civil Rights Act.

Landsberg told the court such directives would have violated the act and HEW's own guidelines, but contended no such directives had been issued.

Taylor Schools Superintendent W. H. Elliston said in an interview afterward that the statements were made twice in his presence. The court never got to the point of evidence on whether the directive was or was not made, since both sides consented to an order declaring that such a directive would be illegal and Taylor County could not be penalized for not transferring Negro students who had asked to remain at McDougald.

Elliston said that last Spring the board sent out first class letters to all parents in the county asking them to state their choice of school for their children. He said that so far as he knew all answered.

WILL ADMIT 8

Of these five Negro elementary students and two high school students asked for transfers to the white school. After Byrd's suit was filed another Negro high school student asked to attend the white school. All eight will be admitted, Elliston said, but board plans to choose an additional six will be dropped.

No one seemed exactly sure how the number six was chosen. The board understood it would be required to force about 120 students to attend schools other than their choice, Elliston said, or face possible cut off of federal funds. They chose to try six to show good faith to HEW, he said. The county school's total program involves about $900,000, some $235,000 of federal funds.

The Justice Department consented to stipulations which formed Judge Elliott's ruling, but objected to making the stipulations the ruling, arguing that Byrd had no legal standing to bring the suit in the first place and that HEW officials had not done any of the things the stipulations agreed they could not do. Judge Elliott brushed these objections aside, and said he would leave the case pending to see what happened.

PRAISES BOTH SIDES

He praised the cooperation of both sides and expressed the hope there "will be no necessity for us to be getting together again."

Veteran Justice Department attorney St. John Barrett, who attended the hearing in Columbus Friday but did not take part in the arguments, said the ruling would not have any major effect because Taylor County had misunderstood HEW and made up a plan that was unique.

Byrd said Camden and Berrien counties would be immediately affected by the decision, and probably numerous others.

He promised that if elected governor he would order suits brought for every county in the state if necessary to preserve the freedom of choice method of desegregation. He hailed the decision as "our first victory against the federal government and Office of Education since 1954."

Is School Aid Losing Its Aim In the North?

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 7/24/66

By GERALD GRANT

Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON, July 23 — Have massive injections of federal school aid actually reinforced school segregation in the North?

This has emerged as one of the crucial problems in the administration of the new program of federal aid to elementary and secondary schools. It was raised this week at the National Conference on Education of the Disadvantaged, called by President Johnson to focus attention on the new legislation.

Prof. Thomas Pettigrew of Harvard University argued that the new federal money may be "self-defeating by acting to separate the poor and disadvantaged" from middle class children.

BECAUSE THE LAW required federal funds to be concentrated on schools in low income areas, a "great danger" exists that it may serve to further isolate children in the ghetto, Pettigrew said.

The professor pointed out that a recent study found that the key to upgrading education of ghetto children was bringing them into contact with children from middle income families.

The U.S. Office of Education study showed that the educational results of sending slum children to school with youngsters from different backgrounds far outweighed gains achieved through such conventional improvements as reducing class size.

Pettigrew, an adviser to the U.S. Civil Rights Commission on northern school segregation, said the federal funds should be used to bring children out of the ghetto into educational parks that would be built in the suburbs.

If such long - range plans are no developed, he warned, the new federal aid program may go down as "unfortunate precedent in education."

WHILE THE U.S. Office of Education, which sponsored the conference, does not have the legislative authority to require that the new federal funds be used to chip away at de facto segregation, it has pushed such moves at the state level.

The federal office has been encouraging state departments of education to attach desegregation strings to the use of federal money. Under the law, the state agencies are charged with approving projects submitted by local scoool districts.

In particular, the federal agency has been supporting the approach that was developed in California. Wilson Riles of the California State Department of Education was invited to the conference to explain how the California plan works.

The California State Board of Education has empowered the department to veto projects that do not make some effort to deal with de facto segregation.

Georgians Urge Ouster Of Compliance Officer

AC 8/5/66

By REMER TYSON

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—A group of angry Georgia school officials Thursday demanded that U.S. education Commissioner Harold Howe transfer his chief civil rights compliance officer for three Deep South states.

W. Stanley Kruger, director of the equal education opportunity program in Georgia, Florida and South Carolina, was described by one of the Georgia educators as "the hatchet man."

Fulton County School Supt. Paul West said he and other educators believe actions by Kruger have been "disruptive for the Office of Education in Georgia."

"We asked him (Howe) to transfer him (Kruger)," said West. Jack Acree, executive secretary of the Georgia School Boards Association, and W. L. Robinson, president of the Fulton County school board, attended the Washington conference with Howe.

West said, "I told the commissioner that it is plainly understood that Mr. Kruger is the hatchet man in Georgia. That's exactly what he is."

The demand for Kruger's transfer came after Fulton County school officials received a letter from the civil rights compliance officer casting doubt on whether the system is qualified for federal funds under 1966 desegregation guidelines.

Fulton County has submitted to the Office of Education a desegregation plan which West said affords students the right to pick their own schools.

Kruger notified Fulton County on July 13 that the number of Negroes enrolled in the previously all-white schools in the system falls "substantially short of that expected in eliminating the dual school system."

West said Kruger pointed out in his letter that additional steps may be taken to make free choice plans effective in bringing about desegregation. But if a community did not give more support to its plan in the future such action "would be a futile gesture," the letter said.

Kruger's letter stated, according to West, that Fulton County educators should seek "further arrangements with parents and civic groups and state and local officials to limit opportunities for intimidation."

West, who along with Acree and Robinson had conferred twice previously with Howe in Washington since April, said the Fulton County system had attempted to comply fully with the guidelines.

The superintendent contended that Fulton County has gone beyond requirements in complying with the new regulations.

West said the system had opened up all 12 grades to Negro students this year rather than eight grades in last year's free choice plan. Fulton County sent out forms to all students 30 days ago to permit them to choose their schools for the coming year, said West.

He said the choice of schools will be open to pupils until Aug. 9. Thirteen Negroes were enrolled in previously all - white schools last year. This year 183 Negroes already have been approved for attendance at white schools.

"We have an increase of 1,216 per cent," West declared. "I don't think that's bad. Then we get this lethal letter from Mr. Kruger."

West said Howe assured them they would not receive any more letters of similar nature from Kruger, although the education commissioner said Kruger's letter could be interpreted in several different ways.

Byrd Predicts Riots If Guidelines Rule

AC 8/6/66

By SAM HOPKINS
Constitution Political Editor

Garland Byrd, one of seven candidates for governor predicted Friday there will be riots in Georgia if federal school guidelines are enforced this fall.

He declared that the "school situation is going to be chaotic" and that if the "illegal guidelines" are enforced there will be riots, demonstrations on the school grounds and a rebellion on the part of students and parents."

Byrd made his remarks in a speech at the Atlanta Press Club and during an interview afterwards.

Byrd said he felt Gov. Carl Sanders should call a special session of the Legislature immediately to appropriate $10 million to supplement schools systems which might have federal funds cut off this year in the event they do not comply with the guidelines. Byrd said if he were governor now he would do this.

He also said Gov. Sanders should instruct Atty. Gen. Arthur Bolton to file a class action suit on behalf of all school systems in an effort to get the same results he did with his suit for Taylor County.

Byrd contends that the Taylor schools, as a result of his suit, will not have to achieve any degree of racial balance but can proceed with a "freedom of choice" plan.

Byrd further said the guidelines could result in the "most active political revolution" in the South.

Byrd also lambasted one of his opponents, former Gov. Ellis Arnall.

"It appears that he has made a deal with the gambling element of this state," Byrd declared. He added that Arnall "has made a deal obviously with those who want to get rid of Col. (Lowell) Conner," director of the Department of Public Safety.

Arnall first had been quoted as saying he would fire Conner if he is elected governor, but later explained that he had said he would ask that Conner be relieved of his duties.

Byrd further said that any drive by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare to implement the new school guidelines will "guarantee my victory in the primary without a run-off."

He felt that the outcome of his suit against the guidelines was "the turning point in my campaign."

Byrd added that he was "thoroughly convinced . . . that we cannot maintain a program of quality education" under the federal guidelines which call for further school and faculty integration this fall.

Wallace Considers Aiming New Law At U.S. Guidelines

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP)—Gov. George C. Wallace, reportedly seeking another major showdown with the federal government over school integration, said Friday he may ask for a state law "to protect the integrity of the school system."

Gov. George Wallace

He called members of the legislature in for closed-door conferences.

Wallace made the comment to newsmen while reports spread through the legislature that significant new developments were impending in the battle over school desegregation guidelines laid down by the U.S. Office of Education.

The governor said he may make a statewide television appearance to explain the proposed legislation if any is introduced.

It was learned that a bill has been tentatively drafted providing for use of state funds to reimburse city and county school boards for federal money lost for refusal to comply with the guidelines.

The suggested bill, which may be rewritten several times before it is complete, also would take away the authority of the local boards to deal with the federal agency and put it in the governor's hands.

NEW CONFRONTATION

Wallace, who stood in the doorway at the University of Alabama three years ago to dramatize his battle against federal intervention, was described by some legislators as determined to touch off a new confrontation over the desegregation guidelines drawn up by the U.S. Office of Education.

His dramatic appearance at the University in 1963 failed to keep two Negro students out. They were enrolled under the protection of federalized National Guardsmen.

There were unconfirmed reports that the governor talked of the possibility of trying this fall to block the assignment of Negro teachers to previously white schools under the guidelines which require faculty as well as pupil integration.

Sources at the Capitol said Wallace may ask the legislature for the power to control distribution of state school funds, bypassing city and county school boards which, under present law, determine how the money is spent.

That would enable him to take money away from boards which comply with the guidelines and give it to those which refuse.

SENATORS' PLEDGE

Wallace summoned a small group of opposition senators to his office for a lengthy meeting Thursday. They reportedly told him they would not fight his proposed plan. Then word went out to House members to see the goveronr Friday after the lower chamber recessed for the weekend.

The legislature has been in special session since July 26, primarily to dip into an estimated $85-million surplus in the special educational trust fund and use $44 million of it to supplement the budgets of all schools for the coming year.

There were reports that the governor also might ask the legislature to use part of the remaining surplus to reimburse defiant school boards for federal money lost because of their refusal to comply with the guidelines.

Wallace contends the guidelines violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and suits an pending in federal court to test them. He has urged school boards repeatedly to resist the guidelines until their legality has been decided.

Man, Boy Team Up, Get $2,174 Loot

Police Friday were searching for a man and a small boy in connection with the theft of a money box containing $2,174 from an apartment building rental office.

Melvin Watkins of 92 Marion Place NE was preparing the money for a bank deposit when a man knocked at the office door and asked for change for $1, Det. T. S. Townsend said.

After the man left, a small boy appeared at the office and said he had placed some clothes in a machine at the washerette, the machine didn't work and he couldn't get the clothes out.

Watkins locked the office and started for the washerette. The boy exclaimed: "Oh, I forgot to bring washing powders. I'll run home and get some."

Watkins found nothing wrong at the washerette. He found plenty wrong when he got back to the office. Townsend said a door glass had been broken, the telephone pulled from the wall and the money box containing the deposit was missing.

30 School Systems Still Not Qualified

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 8/13/66

By JOE BROWN

Federal officials said Friday they still have not received proper guideline compliance forms from about 30 of the 50 Georgia school systems that had their federal funds for new projects deferred about a month ago.

Officials said there is no way of determining the exact number of systems not in compliance since the forms are being processed by several different offices.

However, only two systems in the state have actually been deprived of federal school funds, say officials. These are Toombs and Glascock. Both failed to file compliance pledges last year as well as this year.

Systems on the deferred list are continuing to receive federal funds for programs that were in existence before the guidelines were issued this spring.

State School Superintendent Jack P. Nix said Friday he does not believe that more than 10 or 12 of Georgia's 195 systems will fail to comply by the time school opens this fall.

Only six other systems beside Toombs and Glascock have failed to file a compliance form, Nix said. They are Effingham, Randolph, Seminole, Terrell, Camden and Vidalia.

The guidelines require integration of teaching staffs this fall and further desegregation of student bodies.

Under the guidelines, funds for all new activities are withheld from the offending system. After a hearing funds could be cut off completely.

Most of the systems that are not in compliance filed amended compliance forms.

Federal officials say no amended forms will be accepted from any system.

Gov. Carl E. Sanders Friday was urged by Lt. Gov. Peter Zack Geer to direct the state attorney general to take the matter to federal court.

"HEW is obviously exceeding the purview of the law and badgering Georgia schools as a political foootball. This matter needs to be litigated to the fullest," Geer said.

Howe Says Guides Are Not Affected

AJ 8/15/66

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15 (UPI)—U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe II denies that enactment of the Callaway amendment would affect the much-debated school desegregation guidelines in any way.

The amendment that Rep. Howard (Bo) Callaway, R-Ga., tacked onto the 1966 civil rights bill in the House had been hailed as portending "destruction" of the guidelines.

But Howe says that even if the amendment stays in the bill and the bill passes the Senate and becomes law, it would merely forbid doing something the guidelines do not do.

The amendment, at least, renews a debate that has raged in the South for months, stirred hundreds of school officials to anger and drawn the ire of Southern congressmen.

They say the question is whether the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which forbids federal funds for school systems that discriminate racially, also authorizes Howe to require certain "racial balances."

If it does, the Southerners say, the federal government could destroy "neighborhood schools" that are blamed for de facto segregation by requiring that Negro students be bused to schools in white areas and vice versa.

The 1964 act says: ". . . Desegregation shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance."

But scores of Southern school officials and congressmen have accused Howe of doing just that, and cite the 1966 guidelines themselves as their proof.

The key words come in the guidelines for so-called "freedom of choice" plans for meeting desegregation requirements in systems that have substantial numbers of both white and Negro students:

"The single most substantial indication as to whether a free choice plan is actually working . . . is the extent to which Negro or other minority group students have in fact transferred . . .

". . . The commission will, in general, be guided by the following criteria in scheduling free choice plans for review:

"1. If significant percentage of the students, such as 8 per cent or 9 per cent, transferred from segregated schools for the 1965-66 school year, total transfers on the order of at least twice that percentage would normally be expected.

"2. If a smaller percentage of the students, such as 4 per cent or 5 per cent, transferred . . . a substantial increase in transfers would normally be expected such as would bring the total to at least triple the percentage for the 1965-66 school year . . ."

That, say the guidelines foes, amounts to requiring transfers to correct racial imbalance as specifically forbidden by law. Howe and his attorneys flatly deny it, saying the percentages mentioned are mere clues to effectiveness of desegregation.

The argument wound up in a federal district court in Georgia recently and a judge entered an order forbidding the government to "force" transfers of six unwilling Negro pupils.

The government attorneys consented to the decree, saying no one was doing that anyway. It was, they said in effect, a misunderstanding.

To this legal whirlpool, the Callaway amendment would add these words: "Nothing in this title shall be construed to authorize action by any department or agency to require the assignment of students to public schools to overcome racial imbalance."

Bama Educators Warned After Blast at Wallace

AC 8/20/66

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (UPI)—Leading Alabama educators Friday blasted Gov. George Wallace's proposals to sidestep federal desegregation guidelines and were promptly warned they would "regret this day."

The 23,000-member Alabama Education Association (AEA) including representatives of classroom teachers, local school boards, principals and Auburn University and the University of Alabama, joined in opposition to Wallace's legislation.

Sen. Jimmy Clark, an administration leader, rose on a point of personal privilege in the Senate to return the educators' fire.

WARNS EDUCATOR

"They are going to regret the action they have taken because they have flaunted themselves in the face of the wishes of the majority of the people of Alabama," Sen. Clark angirly proclaimed.

"For a long time there was no confidence in school administration in this state. They have come a long way since then.

"But today, they have started toward their downfall. They will regret this day."

There was no comment from the governor.

In the AEA action, Wallace met the most serious opposition from educators he has faced during his administration. School leaders frequently have bucked him but never so strongly.

SOCIALIST PLOT

Wallace went before a statewide radio-television audience and the legislature Thursday night to explain his proposal and denounce the guidelines as a socialist plot.

The governor asked the legislature to pass a bill which would replace with state funds all federal money lost through defiance of the guidelines. The measure also would nullify any compliance agreements signed by local boards and would establish the legislature as a commission to deal with future guidelines questions.

Wallace told the federal government it could keep its money and "they know what they can do with it."

14 Vetoed School Systems Okayed by U.S., Nix Says

By JOE BROWN

State School Supt. Jack P. Nix said Friday that 14 of the approximately 50 Georgia school systems that previously submitted unacceptable federal school desegregation guidelines compliance forms have now been approved by the U.S. Office of Education.

Another seven systems, he said, have also been ruled to be in compliance with the guidelines. These seven systems, as well as submitting acceptable forms, have passed a federal inspection and judged to be in compliance.

The 14 systems had previously submitted amendment compliance forms which the U.S. Office ruled unacceptable. And payments for new federal programs were deferred. These systems have now submitted unamended forms

Nix said because these forms may be submitted to any one of several offices for processing there is no way of knowing hoy many systems have still failed to pledge compliance.

He predicted however, there will be no more than 10 or 12 of Georgia's 195 school systems that will remain in defiance.

The guidelines require desegregation of teaching staffs this fall and further integration of student bodies.

Nix said systems that are again eligible for new federal funds are:

Candler, Cobb, Clinch, Emanuel, Franklin, Gainesville, Griffin-Spalding, Heard, Laurens, Lowndes, Thomaston, Upson, Meriweather and Rome.

Systems he says the U.S. Office of Education has ruled are in complete compliance are: Thomasville, Trion, Chatooga, Crisp, Floyd, Catoosa and Chattahoochee.

Drive to Clear Up Guidelines Considered Here by 8 States

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 8/20/66

By The Associated Press

A spokesman for the Georgia School Boards Association said here Friday night that representatives from eight Southern states have agreed to consider a united drive to clarify federal desegregation guidelines.

Jack K. Acree, executive secretary of the Georgia association, said representatives of similar associations from the other states met here Wednesday.

He declined to name the other seven states involved "because they have to go back home and check with their official boards, and I told them that they would not be put on the spot."

Acree said the representatives agreed however that a problem common to all the states was "preservation of local government particularly as refers to our educational units."

"The federal government with its multiplicity of programs is beginning to exercise so much pressure that these people honestly feel that even the soundest of local units of administration are in danger of being so pressured that they will just become ineffective," he said.

And, he added, "We don't know what to expect in the future."

He said the Georgia association previously has decided "to seek a clarification of the exact intent of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 either by court action and/or through legislative action."

Acree said the association then decided to invite other Southern and border states to join in the effort if they wanted.

"We felt like we needed an interchange of information with regard to conditions, developments and plans for stabilizing the educational program in all our dealings with the Department of Health, Education and Welfare," he said.

He said the persons attending the meeting felt that a court test probably would be necessary to clarify the meaning of the civil rights law.

However, he said the test suit would not necessarily have to be filed in Georgia.

"On receipt of a copy of the Georgia plan last Friday, Gov. (Robert) McNair of South Carolina announced that the state would file such a suit."

He said the Georgia group outlined its program of action at the request of local boards across the state and after several Georgia educators met with U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe II three times. He said the meetings with Howe were "futile efforts . . . to change the practices and trends emanating from his office."

Kruger Is Called Most Hated Official

SCHOOL DESEG

Atlanta Constitution 8/22/66

By ED ROGERS

WASHINGTON (UPI)—The U.S. Commissioner of Education has been publicly called the nation's "most hated bureaucrat" because of his role in the federal drive against school segregation.

But in the states of Florida, Georgia and South Carolina, Commissioner Harold Howe II has a close rival in his regional enforcement officer, a former math teacher named Stanley Kruger.

In fact, Kruger has attracted so much ire of the school officials and congressmen of the three states that some of them have even spoken fondly of Howe in making comparisons.

This occurred recently when Dr. Paul West, superintendent of the Fulton County schools in the Atlanta area, returned from a trip to demand that Kruger be transferred.

HATCHET MAN

"We have deepest respect for the commissioner and we sympathize with him that some of his associates are so highly confused," West told reporters. He called Kruger a "hatchet man."

This was no isolated blast. There is a growing list of complaints that Kruger has "demanded" certain results that higher officials later said were not necessary.

The chain of events reached into a federal courtroom when Kruger was charged with demanding the transfer of six Negro children, against their will, to a white school in Georgia.

Attorneys for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which operates the education office, denied any such demand was ever made and that ended the case.

SOUGHT HIM OUT

With so much controversy spiraling around Kruger, a reporter last week sought him out at his office in a weathered "temporary" World War II building off Washington's mall.

Kruger turned out to be a blond, stocky, neatly dressed and quiet-speaking Illinois native of 37, who discussed the Kruger controversy as detachedly as if he were another person.

Kruger had these theories as to why he is far more controversial than his counterparts in other regions:

—There has been turnover among all the others.

—Not withstanding Alabama's Gov. George Wallace, school officials in his state possibly feel more assurance that their congressmen some day will overrule Kruger.

HELPED ON GUIDELINES

—Kruger helped draft the 1966 guidelines

Kruger offered these further defenses of Kruger:

—He feels obligated to tell local school officials what will be expected of them and, on their request will offer specific numbers or percentages of transfers that would be acceptable.

—This explains the accusations that his "demands" exceeded those of his superiors, he said. They were not "demands" but "acceptable alternatives," he said.

—Before the 1966 guidelines controversy arose, he dealt amicably with the same state and local officials on technical procedures of obtaining federal school funds.

EMOTIONAL CONTENT

He said his personality has not changed. The "emotional content is low" in the subject of school finances, he explained.

When asked if he had made a single misstatement of federal policy or of what the law requires in all of his dealings with southern school officials, Kruger said:

"I don't think so. I am extremely confident that I did not."

But West claims Kruger received at least one rebuke.

West said he protested about "a lethal letter—I know of no other word to call it — "from Kruger and Howe assured him he will get no more letters like that.

Wallace's Plan Wins Educators

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 8/23/66

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP)—Gov. George Wallace won the support of the state school board and 14 junior college presidents Monday for his new plan to defy federal integration guidelines.

First the state board and then the junior college presidents adopted statements endorsing Wallace's stand on the eve of the first showdown in the legislature.

They came as two legislative committees—Ways and Means in the House and Finance in the Senate—prepared for a joint public hearing starting at 9 a.m., Tuesday on the administration-sponsored bill which would:

—Prohibit city and county school boards from complying with the guidelines and nullify any compliance agreements previously made.

SUBSTITUTE FUNDS

—Allocate state funds to reimburse part of the federal funds which might be withheld from school boards which defy the federal desegregation regulations.

The pledge of support, along with those earlier from Presidents Ralph Adams of Troy State College and John Deloney of Livingston State, helped offset the opposition expressed earlier by officials of the Alabama Education Association and other school leaders, including spokesmen for the University of Alabama and Auburn University.

But two more organizations took a stand meanwhile against the pending bill. They are the Alabama League of Women Voters and the Alabama Division of the American Association of University Women.

THREATS CHARGED

In a resolution which accused federal officials of using "threats, intimidation and pressures," the state school board endorsed Wallace's plan.

It is "in the best interest" of Alabama's educational system, the resolution declared, for local boards "to refuse to abide by any illegal guidelines and to refuse to be abused, intimidated and coerced" by representatives of the Health, Education and Welfare Department.

The state board said the guidelines, which require faculty as well as pupil integration, would "seriously impair the education system of this state."

To: All South Carolinians interested in equality of education opportunity

From: Hayes Mizell, South Carolina Field Representative, American Friends Service Committee

Date: August 30, 1966

As we begin the 1966-1967 public school year in South Carolina, it is apparent that there is a great deal of confusion and misunderstanding concerning school desegregation and compliance with the 1966 "Guidelines". In some cases, this state of confusion has been enhanced by certain inaccurate statements which have been promulgated by political leaders as well as school officials themselves. As a result, many South Carolinians are unsure of the realities of the school desegregation situation in their own districts as well as in the state as a whole.

We felt that it might be helpful to you to have accurate and specific information concerning certain aspects of school desegregation. Enclosed you will find "Questions and Answers About School Desegregation in South Carolina". This attempts to briefly respond to and clarify many of the questions most commonly asked about school desegreation. Also enclosed is Federal Rights Under School Desegregation Law. This booklet answers many questions about the 1966 "Guidelines", and this might also be helpful to you.

We hope that you will give careful attention to this material and that it will be of service to you. I will be happy to send additional copies on request. Perhaps you will want to distribute them to members of your civic group, education organization, parents group, or church. If you have any further questions or problems, please do not hesitate to contact me.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS ABOUT

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION IN SOUTH CAROLINA

1. I have heard a lot about the "Guidelines". What are they?

The correct name for the "Guidelines" is the "Revised Statement of Policies for School Desegregation Plans Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964". The "Guidelines" were issued by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in March, 1966. A school district must meet the requirements of the "Guidelines" to be in compliance with Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Title VI provides that: "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

2. Can I get a copy of the "Guidelines"?

An exact copy of the "Guidelines" can be found on pages 11 through 21 of the accompanying booklet, Federal Rights Under School Desegregation Law.

3. Who is responsible for administering the "Guidelines" and determining whether or not a school district is complying with the "Guidelines"?

The final responsibility, of course, lies with John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. However, most of the day-to-day administrative responsibility is assumed by the U.S. Office of Education headed by Harold Howe II, U.S. Commissioner of Education. Within the Office of Education there is a division known as the Equal Educational Opportunities Program (EEOP), and it is primarily this office that reviews performance data, investigates complaints, and attempts to get school districts to comply with the "Guidelines". David S. Seeley, Assistant Commissioner for Equal Educational Opportunities Program, has directed Title VI enforcement efforts in the Office of Education since the 1964 Civil Rights Act was passed.

4. I have read about a Dr. Kruger and Mrs. Price in the U.S. Office of Education. Who are they?

The Equal Educational Opportunities Program is divided into geographical divisions of responsibility. Dr. W. Stanley Kruger is director of area number two which includes South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. Mrs. Suzanne D. Price works under the supervision of Dr. Kruger, and she is the chief of the South Carolina state team; that is, those persons who work only with South Carolina school districts on matters relating to compliance with the "Guidelines".

5. Where do I write or call if I want information about my school district or if I want to report a complaint?

You should first go to your local school authorities. If they do not give you the information you believe you are entitled to, or if they do not cooperate with you in handling your complaint, you should then contact Mrs. Price. Her address is: Mrs. Suzanne D. Price, Acting Chief, Area II South Carolina State Team, Equal Educational Opportunities Program, U.S. Office of Education, Temporary S--7th & Jefferson, S.W., Washington, D.C. 20202. Mrs. Price can be reached by telephone at (202) 962-4339.

6. What happens if a school district does not comply with the "Guidelines"?

The school district is not in compliance with Title VI and thereby risks losing the federal funds it receives for various programs.

7. Exactly what is the process by which a school district loses its federal funds?

(A) When a field review, complaint, compliance report, or any other information indicates a possible violation of Title VI, an investigation is ordered. If any violation of the "Guidelines" is found, information, persuasion, and conciliation will be used to secure the elimination of the prohibited discriminatory practices. During this entire process, names of complainants will be kept confidential to the extent possible.

(B) If informal efforts at persuasion fail to correct the situation, formal means for resolving violations of Title VI regulations are available.

(C) The school district is formally cited for non-compliance with Title VI.

(D) The school district is given an opportunity for a fair hearing.

(E) The hearing examiner makes his report to the Secretary of HEW.

(F) The Secretary of HEW makes a report to the education committees of each house of Congress.

(G) If the Secretary of HEW recommends that federal funds to the school district be terminated, the order is not final until 30 days after the Congressional committees are notified.

(H) The school district can then appeal the final order to the federal courts.

8. I have heard that some districts did not submit HEW Form 441-B or submitted an altered HEW Form 441-B? What is this form?

HEW Form 441-B is a statement of assurance that the school system will abide by the requirements of the "Guidelines". All school districts were to have submitted HEW Form 441-B by April 15, 1966, or "commitments of funds for new activities will be subject to deferral." (See page 12, section 181.7 of the accompanying booklet.)

9. Which South Carolina school systems did not submit Form 441-B this year?

Calhoun County School District #1 (St. Matthews)
Georgetown County School District
Marlboro County School District
Orangeburg County School District #7 (Elloree)

10. Didn't some South Carolina school districts refuse to accept federal funds last year?

Yes. Among them were: Calhoun County School District #2 (Cameron)
Clarendon County School District #2 (Manning)
Lexington County School District #1 (Lexington)

11. Will these school districts be able to maintain a segregated school system since they aren't receiving federal funds?

No. All three of these districts have been or are presently involved in federal court litigation which could prevent these systems from operating on a segregated basis. A school district must desegregate whether or not it receives federal funds. (See page 5, section II, questions one and two, of the accompanying booklet.)

12. Which South Carolina school districts are presently operating under federal court order?

Charleston County School District #20 (city of Charleston)
Clarendon County School District #1 (Summerton)
Darlington County School District
Greenville County School District
Orangeburg County School District #5 (city of Orangeburg)
Sumter County School District #2 (county, except city of Sumter)

13. What is the present status of these court order districts?

On August 26, 1966, United States District Judges J. Robert Martin, Robert W. Hemphill, and Charles E. Simons, Jr. handed down a new court order for these districts. The order said that, "The school board is constitutionally required to give Negro students the means by which to attend integrated schools. The means can best be met through a system of free choice of schools." The court orders require desegregation of faculty, school programs and facilities, and school bus transportation. Other requirements closely follow the administrative procedures suggested in the 1966 "Guidelines". The orders also stated that, "It is the constitutional obligation of school boards during the time that school systems are being desegregated, that they provide Negro students with an education equal to that provided white students." A hearing will be held on September 1 to inform the court order school districts how the new orders should be implemented. A copy of the court orders can be obtained for a fee by writing to Clerk, United States District Court, U.S. Court House, Columbia, South Carolina.

14. What is the purpose of the percentages required by the "Guidelines"?

The percentages required by the 1966 "Guidelines" are merely for the purpose of determing how satisfactorily a school system is progressing toward the elimination of the dual school system. The Office of Education is able to determine a school system's progress by looking at how many Negro children have transferred from the "Negro school" to the desegregated school. In order to do this, they divide the number of Negro children who will be attending desegregated schools in the district into the total number of Negro children enrolled in the district. The resulting percentage is an accurate measure of the progress a school system is making in moving towards the abolition of segregated schools. The percentages which are required are not to determine how many Negroes are going to school with whites, or to determine if a racial balance is being achieved. Perhaps you will want to write to Harold Howe II, U.S. Commissioner of Education, Office of Education, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Washington, D.C. 20202, and ask for a copy of his May 24, 1966, letter to Senator Fulbright. This letter answers many of the misunderstandings about the "Guidelines".

15. How much pupil desegregation will there be in South Carolina for the 1966-1967 school term?

For the average school district about 5.1% of all of the Negro students enrolled in the district will be attending desegregated schools. This means, for instance, that in a district where there are 1,619 Negro students enrolled in the schools, 83 of these will be enrolled in desegregated schools. It is estimated that there will be a total of 219,044 Negro students enrolled in 95 school districts this year. Of this number, only 11,163 will be attending desegregated schools. To give you a better idea of the degree of desegregation, there are 15 school districts which fall within the 1% - 2% range; 10 that fall within the 2% - 3% range; 17 that fall within the 5% - 6% range; 9 that fall within the 7% - 8% range.

16. My school superintendent says that our school system has offered a proper freedom-of-choice, but not enough Negroes have chosen to attend the desegregated school, and it is therefore impossible for our system to meet the percentages required by the Office of Education. Should we be subject to the requirements of the "Guidelines" if we have honestly acted in good faith but have not gotten good results?

The 1966 "Guidelines" clearly state that it is the responsibility of the school system to adopt a school desegregation plan which will end the dual school system. There is no requirement that your system must use the freedom-of-choice plan. Indeed, you may utilize any plan you devise just so long as it effectively moves your system toward the goal of eliminating the dual school system. Perhaps the freedom-of-choice plan is not the best method for ending the dual school system in your district. Your superintendent, school board, and community should understand that in order to abolish the dual school system, it might be necessary for your school district to adopt another type of plan. Indeed, it is likely that if your present plan is determined to be ineffective by the Office of Education, you will be required to adopt another plan in the future. (See page 13, section 181.11 of the accompanying booklet.)

17. Is freedom-of-choice effective in eliminating the dual school system?

In some communities it is true that freedom-of-choice is the best method for eliminating the dual school system. Generally, however, it does not seem to be very effective. This device still places the burden on the Negro parent or child, since they must make the decision to attend the desegregated school, and obviously if they do not make such a decision, for whatever reason, then the schools will not be desegregated and the dual school system will not be abolished. In some places in the South, the Negroes are intimidated and harassed by whites in an effort to keep them from making the choice to attend a predominantly white school. For other Negroes, they hesitate to send their children to a desegregated school where they may be socially isolated and where the opportunities for leadership recognition and involvement in extra-curricular activities are not as great as in the Negro school. Some parents are reluctant to send their children to a non-racial school because of their fear that they will be the victims of physical or economic reprisals. Too, nearly three hundred years of servitude and segregation has stripped many Negroes of the initiative required to make the choice to send their children to desegregated schools; such inertia is sometimes evident in entire communities. If your school system has a freedom-of-choice plan, it is the responsibility of your school officials to gain the support of the community for the plan and to make every effort to aid in the removal of the above-mentioned factors which tend to inhibit the number of choices made by Negro parents.

18. Last year my school district had 47 Negro students attending desegregated schools. This year there will be 140 Negro students attending schools across racial lines. Is this sufficient progress for the Office of Education?

This year there will be a total of 3,811 Negro students enrolled in your school district. Therefore, only 3.8% of the total number of Negroes enrolled in your district will be attending desegregated schools in 1966-1967. If your school system is supposed to be moving toward the abolition of the dual school system by 1967-1968, your present rate of desegregation doesn't represent very satisfactory progress. The "Guidelines" require your school district to have 12% of the total number of Negroes enrolled attending desegregated schools. Keep in mind that the goal is to abolish the dual school system, and progress is measured by how well you are moving toward achieving that goal--not by comparing the amount of desegregation now with that of the past.

19. Does the 1964 Civil Rights Act require racial balance in the schools?

No. In fact, the 1964 Civil Rights Act says: "'Desegregation' means the assignment of students to public schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin, but 'desegregation' shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance."

20. Do the 1966 "Guidelines" require racial balance in the schools?

No. There is positively no mention in the "Guidelines" of racial balance, quotas or percentages to achieve racial balance, and there are no requirements for racial balance to be achieved.

21. What is this about South Carolina challenging the 1966 "Guidelines" in court?

Governor McNair has indicated that the State of South Carolina will bring a suit in the name of a school district to challenge the legality of the 1966 "Guidelines". It has not been announced which school district will cooperate with the State in bringing the suit. Governor McNair has said that both "federal demands for the racial 'balance' in classrooms and faculty integration will be contested."

22. Are there possible political implications in this decision to challenge the "Guidelines" in court?

Apparently. At the state Republican convention in March, the GOP passed a resolution calling for a court test of the "Guidelines". Republican gubernatorial nominee, Joseph O. Rogers, Jr., then began using the 1966 "Guidelines" as a political issue and called for a court test of the "Guidelines". Governor McNair was therefore put in a position of either having to challenge the "Guidelines" and deny Mr. Rogers of a campaign issue, or do nothing and allow Mr. Rogers to use this as a political issue and attack the Governor for agreeing with the "Guidelines". Governor McNair contends that by challenging the "Guidelines" in court, he has removed this issue from the political arena.

23. Are the "Guidelines" illegal?

This has yet to be determined in the federal courts, but it is generally agreed by HEW lawyers that the "Guidelines" will stand up in court. The "Guideline" requirements are based on federal court decisions in school desegregation cases, and they require nothing that has not also been a part of these decisions. Since these provisions have been handed down previously by federal courts in individual cases, it would not seem that they are illegal. Perhaps you will also want to write to Commissioner Howe and ask for a copy of his May 20, 1966, memorandum "Authority for the 1966 School Desegregation Guidelines".

24. I have read that the "Guidelines" have not been approved by the President even though this is required. Is this true?

The President does not have to approve the "Guidelines" as such. He did have to approve the Regulation on which the "Guidelines" are based, and this has been done. The "Guidelines" do have White House support, however. (For the approved Regulation, see 29 Federal Register 16298; 45 C.F.R., Subtitle A, part 80.)

25. Were Southern educators asked to discuss the "Guidelines" with the Office of Education as they were being formulated?

Yes. The Office of Education sought the opinions of a number of educators and superintendents before the "Guidelines" were published. This is one reason the "Guidelines" were not published until March, though they were to have been out by January.

26. What are the "Guidelines" requirements for faculty and staff desegregation?

If there are 8 schools in your district, there should be 8 teachers involved in faculty desegregation. This does not mean that there has to be one teacher desegregating the faculty in each school. There might be several white teachers in one Negro school while another Negro school in the district might not have any faculty desegregation at all. (See page 13, section 181.13 of the accompanying booklet.)

27. My superintendent says that the Negro teachers are not as well qualified as white teachers and if we integrate the faculty, my child will be taught by a poor teacher. Is this true?

There are good teachers and poor teachers, well-qualified and poorly qualified--both Negro and white. Your child is already receiving an inferior education because he attends a public school in South Carolina. Lack of school accreditation, lack of a compulsory school attendance law, low teachers' salaries, lack of a state tenure law for teachers, the lack of free textbooks for all twelve grades, and the lack of leadership by political and community leaders all combine to contribute to the lack of quality education available to our children. It is obvious that there are Negro teachers who are not as well qualified as whites--you do not segregate and deprive a racial group and then expect the highest quality. It should also be apparent that there are a large number of white teachers who are also not of the best quality. We must be careful not to allow whatever problems might be created by faculty desegregation to be used as an excuse for not desegregating our faculties at all. We must also be careful not to focus our attention on this one problem when there are so many problems in education which we continue to ignore. If there are problems in any area of education, we must attempt to deal with them in a rational and progressive way. If there are poor teachers, Negro and white, and for whatever reasons, it is the responsibility of the school system to upgrade these teachers and for us as citizens to promote legislation and policies which will enable our schools to hire more and better teachers, Negro and white.

28. How can we improve the quality of our teachers?

There are many, many federal programs which your school district can utilize to upgrade your teachers and to permit them to earn credit toward advanced degrees. Many of these programs involve in-service training for teachers, and they can be conducted in your school during the week or on weekends. For other programs, the teachers must go to another city for the summer, or perhaps even take a year's leave of absence. Title IV of the 1964 Civil Rights Act makes funds available to local school boards for in-service training of teachers. Since many of the state's teachers will be teaching disadvantaged children, there are other programs which are available along this line. In-service teacher training for special programs to better help disadvantaged children may be supported by a local Community Action Program funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity. It may also be supported under Title I, Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. In-service training may also be accomplished under the National Defense Education Act, Title XI, which provides specifically for retraining teachers of the economically deprived. The National Science Foundation has various programs for upgrading science teachers. There are other programs which provide for training in such specialities as counseling, guidance, working with the handicapped, and the arts and humanities. Don't let anyone tell you that teachers can't be improved. The materials are available, the money is available, and consultants are available. It is up to you and your school system to utilize these resources. Perhaps you will want to write for the booklet, Education: An Answer to Poverty. This can be obtained without charge from the Community Action Program, Office of Economic Opportunity, Washington, D.C. 20506, or the Publications Distribution Unit, U.S. Office of Education, Washington, D.C. 20202. This booklet describes a number of programs for the disadvantaged, but the appendix lists "Sources of Government Funding" and gives a brief description of what is available and where to write for specific information.

29. Will there be much desegregation of faculties in South Carolina schools this year?

As of the first of August, it was reported that 75% of the state's school districts plan no full-time classroom teacher assignments across racial lines. Perhaps this will change as school districts begin to be cited for non-compliance with Title VI.

30. My superintendent says that he cannot find any white teachers who are willing to teach in the "Negro school". Can he be expected to desegregate his faculty under such circumstances?

Yes. Many superintendents are apparently asking their teachers where they want to teach. It is hardly within the framework of the traditional employer-employee relationship for the employer to leave it up to the employee to do only what he or she wants to do. Perhaps your superintendent lacks the proper administrative skill if he finds himself in this kind of situation. Has he contacted the Peace Corps to see if there are any returning Corpsmen who would be willing to do this? Has he explored the possibility of requesting members of the Teachers Corps to teach in the all-Negro school? Has he really looked for people in your own community who might be willing to do this? Has he really tried to find a teacher in his system who will desegregate the faculty of the school of the opposite race? Perhaps you will want to write the U.S. Office of Education for the May 31, 1966, memorandum, "Suggestions for School Officials Starting Faculty Desegregation".

31. My superintendent says that he has not heard from Washington whether or not our school district is in compliance. Why is this?

Letters from the U.S. Office of Education are going out very shortly, perhaps by the time you receive this, to 600 school districts in the South which have met the requirements of the "Guidelines". Those school districts which are in some form of non-compliance will receive letters soon thereafter. The Office of Education is under-staffed and has had difficulty coping with complaints, performance data, and investigating evidence of non-compliance. They have been furthered delayed by school superintendents who have sought clarification in regard to the "Guidelines" and, in many instances, by superintendents and U.S. congressmen who have pressured them to make exceptions to and weaken the "Guidelines". It is also necessary to realize that in the federal government, it is no simple matter to draft these letters and then clear them with numerous officials. In any case, however, the "Guidelines" are quite clear about the requirements, and no superintendent should have any doubt as to whether or not his district is in compliance. In too many instance it appears that the superintendent and school board have done the absolute minimum and are now willing to gamble as to whether or not their school district will be judged as being in compliance.

32. My superintendent says that he is being "harassed" and "intimidated" and is under "tremendous pressure" from the Office of Education. Is this true?

Your school district is probably in some form of non-compliance with Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the requirements of the "Guidelines". The Office of Education is interested only in your school system abolishing the dual school system and complying with the 1966 "Guidelines". They do not want any school district to lose its federal funds, and they are making every attempt to get your school district to comply with the law. The Office of Education has no desire to recommend that a school district's funds be withheld without first giving the district every opportunity to comply with the law in good faith. The law is clear. It is the responsibility of your school officials to devise a plan which will make substantial progress toward eliminating the dual school system in your district. It is unfortunate that the Office of Education must expend time, energy, and tax-dollars to try to get your school superintendent and school board to assume their rightful responsibilities.

33. People from the Office of Education have been in my school district asking questions and talking with people. What are they doing?

These people are probably investigators. They are investigating complaints which have been made to the Office of Education by people in your district, or they are trying to find out why more Negroes did not transfer during the freedom-of-choice period. They will make a report to the Office of Education, and this will be used to determine if your school district has complied in good faith with the "Guidelines" requirements or perhaps to determine if another plan other than freedom-of-choice would better promote the abolition of the dual school system in your district.

34. The school officials in my district say that they have been notified that our school district has not met the requirements of the 1966 "Guidelines", but they will not take any further steps to meet the "Guideline" requirements. What will happen?

HEW will begin very shortly to start proceedings to cut off funds for the school districts which have the worst performance records. Perhaps your district is one of these. If not, you can still be assured that sooner or later HEW will get to your district. Your district will be given every opportunity to comply, and if it still refuses to do so, its federal funds will be terminated.

35. My superintendent says that if our federal funds are cut off, then the Negro school will be denied many of the programs it is operating with Elementary and Secondary Education Act money. Won't this hurt the very people you are trying to help?

Your superintendent is trying to place the blame for the termination of federal funds on HEW. It is not their desire to recommend that federal money be withheld from your district, and they certainly want every child to receive the full benefit of any programs which are available. HEW is only doing what is necessary to see that the law is enforced. It is your school officials who are unwilling to comply with the "Guidelines" and who apparently are willing to sacrifice federal money for needed programs. It is clearly their responsibility to take actions which the law requires, and if they refuse to do so, then they must also assume the responsibility for the termination of federal funds and the subsequent cut-back in programs operated with such funds. If your officials are sincere in their desire to provide a quality education for all of the school children of your district, then they should comply with the law and even try to get more federal funds so as to improve the educational system of your schools.

36. My neighbor says that the federal government has practically taken over the local school systems. What about this?

The federal government has taken only those steps which it has been forced to take by the inertia of the local school boards. We no longer live in the early years of the Twentieth Century when school boards had absolute control over their schools and when there was discrimination, inferior education for all, low school attendance; and widespread poverty was the order of the day. Much of the improvement in education is because of the federal government. The "Guidelines" this year are more stringent than last only because last year's "Guidelines" were violated in letter and spirit by so many school officials. As all adults should realize, it is much easier to go ahead and do the right thing.

All in all, however, the federal government has very little control or influence on local school boards. Perhaps you would be interested in ordering the booklet, Survey of School Desegregation in the Southern and Border States, 1965-1966, which tells of some of the problems in school desegregation last year. This report is available without charge from U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Washington, D.C. 20425. We would hope that school officials will comply with the law this year to the extent that such a booklet and more stringent "Guidelines" will not be necessary next year.

37. Aren't we moving too fast in the area of school desegregation?

No. It has been twelve years since the 1954 Supreme Court decision of Brown et.al. vs. Board of Education of Topeka et.al. Very little school desegregation has taken place since that time, and one generation of school children has attended segregated schools during these twelve years. Furthermore, there have been a number of federal district court and federal appeals court decisions since that time which have called for more progress in eliminating the dual school system.

38. Are the Negroes satisfied with the way things are?

No. On August 7, 1966, over 400 Negro community leaders from all over South Carolina attended a conference at the Wade Hampton Hotel. This conference was sponsored by the South Carolina Voter Education Project, and the group passed an eight-hundred word resolution calling on HEW to require school districts to abandon the freedom-of-choice system and devise some other plan which would abolish the dual school system by September, 1967. You can obtain a copy of this resolution by writing to the South Carolina Voter Education Project, 1719 Taylor Street, Columbia, South Carolina.

39. Is the Office of Education only concerned with desegregating the schools in the South? What about the de facto segregation that exists in the Northern cities?

The Office of Education is interested in eliminating all segregation in the schools of this country. So far it has focused its attention on the South because it is here that segregation in the schools is often perpetuated by law and by local administrative decisions which often have the force of law. In the North, segregation in the schools has occured because of the presence of large ghettos, shifting housing patterns, and immigration of minority groups into urban areas. The problem of de facto segregation is much more difficult because it is so massive and complex. The Office of Education is working on this problem, however, and is seeking solutions to it. The Office of Education has also just issued a summary report of their study, Equality of Educational Opportunity. This was a nation-wide study, and it is available for 30¢ from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402. Ask for the publicaion by name and by number, OE-38000.

40. What can I do to help our school officials abolish the dual school system in our school district?

First, let your school superintendent and school board know that you are interested in getting on with the business of eliminating our dual schools. Let them know of your interest in education and your willingness to cooperate in whatever way possible to provide equality of educational opportunity for all of South Carolina's children. Discuss this with your friends and your business and club associates. Get the facts. Don't rely just on your local newspaper to find out what is going on. Communicate with your superintendent on a regular basis--even if he is generally uncooperative. Order and read materials which give you the facts and tell you what can be done in your community. Meet with others who have common interests in this problem and discuss what you can do together to bring about change in your school district. Seek out leaders of the opposite race and get their opinions and help; try to work together. Utilize the resources of organizations in your community and state that are interested in school desegregation and equality of educational opportunity for all.

2 Sumter Whites Integrate Negro School

AMERICUS, Ga. (UPI)—The only two white students in Georgia to transfer from a white school to a Negro school this year are doing fine, according to the leader of the commune-like farm where the boys live.

"They're quite happy in their decision," said the Rev. Clarence Jordan. "They have no regrets."

Jordan is leader of the Koinonia Farm 13 miles southwest of Americus.

The two boys, David Whittkamper, 16, and Lenny Jordan, 13, were the only two white students to request transfer to a previously all-Negro school under the federal desegregation guidelines, the State Department of Education reported.

More than 11,800 Negroes transferred to white schools as school began in most of Georgia this week.

One other high school student and three elementary school students from the farm elected to go to predominantly white schools.

"We left it up to them (the children) and we support them in their decision," Jordan said.

The two boys spent their second day among the 327 Negro students in Sumter High School Tuesday.

Jordan said they are not only the sole white students in the school but are the only white students on the bus which transports them there.

"I understood that buses were to be integrated, but there is still a white bus and a Negro bus on the road by the farm every morning," Jordan said.

Young Jordan and Whittkamper live in an environment that has specialized in being different. Jordan, a Baptist minister, founded Koinia in the 1940s and it has been a source of controversy in Sumter County since.

The members of the farm live and work together as one big family unit which is composed of individuals and entire families. All of them are white, but in the past the farm has been integrated.

During civil rights demonstrations in Americus, city officials charged that civil rights workers stayed on the farm. The farm has been raked by bombings and shots fired into homes, and at one time there was an economic boycott against the farm's products.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

12 YEARS AFTER HIGH COURT RULING

Desegregation Speed Is Very Deliberate

By HAL COOPER

NEW YORK, Sept. 3 (AP)—A dozen years after the U.S. Supreme Court ban on school segregation, most Negro youngsters in Southern states and in many big northern cities return this month to classrooms predominantly or wholly black.

An Associated Press check showed that:

—Despite pressure from the federal government, including threats to cut off educational aid funds, substantially less than 10 per cent of Negroes are expected to attend classes with whites in most of the South.

—In northern metropolitan centers with huge, densely concentrated Negro populations, hardly a dent has been made on the problem of "de facto segregation," arising from racially unbalanced neighborhoods.

IN THE SOUTH, thousands of Negro children will be admitted to previously all white schools for the first time. The percentage has been moving up from year to year. But, says Mrs. Ruby Hurley, southeastern regional director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP):

"It appears that this year is going to be little if any better than last in spite of the efforts of the federal office of education.

"The federal guidelines are making little or no difference so far as boards of education are concerned. We are still going to have to go back to the courts."

In many northern cities the integration picture appears to have become more complicated, if anything. Some municipal authorities who have tried and discarded such devices as busing Negro students to white schools, seemed to regard the problem as insoluble under prevailing conditions.

THE EXODUS of white families from cities to suburbs continues. More and more white parents who stay in the cities are sending their children to private schools. The proportion of Negro students in the public affiliated office of integration and intergroup relations, said 40 per cent of the city's children attend private or parochial schools. Virtually all of these children are white.

"It is conceivable," said Pollack, "that the majority of white children in Philadelphia go to private and parochial schools."

What will happen if the big cities find themselves with too few white pupils remaining to make genuine integration possible — a state of affairs already approaching in Washington.

Dr. Laurence G. Paquin, superintendent of public instruction in Baltimore (116,800 Negro pupils, 73,950 white) made this wry observation:

"THE SCHOOLS cannot be fully integrated without white children."

Sterling Tucker, executive director of the Washington, D.C., Urban League, suggests that the District of Columbia (84,280 Negroes, 8,385 whites in the elementary grades) exchange students by bus with schools in the mainly-white suburbs.

"Integration is important because of its learning and teaching value," said Tucker. "But at no cost do we want to sacrifice quality education."

Carl F. Hansen, Washington's superintendent of schools, insists children do best attending schools close to their homes.

"We're in the business of educating children," says Hansen. "To move them out for sociological purposes is destructive of the process. The mechanism for moving people out of poverty should be education, not buses."

New York City, which expects a school enrollment of about 1,091,625 this year, has been in turmoil over integration for years and has tried a series of futile experiments.

The enrollment breaks down into 28.4 Negro, 19.8 per cent enrollments of 90 per cent or more.

INTEGRATED FIRST GRADE BUT THE PROBLEMS ARE MANY AND YET UNSOLVED

Proportion of Negro Students in Public Schools Is Rising as Whites Are Studying Elsewhere

In 1960 the city started an open enrollment program permitting pupils from schools with a high percentage of Negroes and Puerto Ricans to transfer to schools in predominantly white neighborhoods. Another experiment has been to "pair" Negro and white schools, busing pupils from one to the other.

THE LATEST New York idea, effective this school year, is to keep the first four grades of elementary schools on a neighborhood basis while placing fifth through eighth grades on an open enrollment basis.

Dissatisfaction among parents of both races led to citywide school boycotts by Negro pupils in February and March, 1964, and by whites in September of the same year.

White parents organized as the "parents and taxpayers coordinating council" set up two private schools in Queens rather than accept the pairing plan.

Chicago, another center of uproar over de facto school segregation, has so far insisted that in general students must attend neighborhood schools.

Briggs says that what the Negroes want is "not bussing, but quality education — the best way to get the Negro out of the ghetto is to give him the tools . . . a good education."

Los Angeles, where one pupil in five is Negro, tried busing in 1963 to relieve overcrowding in Negro schools, but gave it up after one semester. The board of education said too few children took advantage of the project.

LOS ANGELES retains an "open permit" policy which allows parents to transfer their children to schools outside the neighborhood, but parents must provide the transportation.

Bob Hilburn, a spokesman for the Los Angeles County board of education, says "as far as we can see, the question of integration really isn't a problem here."

Rev. H. H. Brookins, director of the Los Angeles United Civil Rights Committee, disagrees.

He says Negro school facilities are inferior to those in white areas, substandard teachers are assigned to predominantly Negro districts and there is overcrowding and de facto to locate new schools in areas where integration is feasible — that is, where concentrations of the two races live fairly close together.

Philadelphia buses pupils mostly Negroes, to relieve overcrowding, but has no policy of transporting them from one school to another for purposes of integration.

DETROIT, which has three high schools where Negroes make up 94 per cent or more of the enrollment and half a dozen with 90 per cent or more whites, is trying to break down the pattern with a permissive transfer system.

Students may transfer to schools outside their neighborhoods if (1) the move will advance integration, (2) the neighhood school lacks special academic programs available elsewhere or (3) a move would contribute to a pupil's mental or social adjustment.

Negro dissatisfaction with Detroit schooling came to a head last April when 2,300 students at predominantly Negro northern high school staged a brief boycott. Placards displayed by student pickets said "we are tired of a third rate education."

of the 148 public schools, but 81 per cent are concentrated in only 25 schools.

The Milwaukee United School Integration Committee, a civil rights group, accuses the school board of fostering de facto segregation by insisting in general that children attend neighborhood school.

This group and other proponents of integration urge the busing of Negro students to white schools and the construction of schools in racial border areas.

Defending the neighborhood school system, school board president John F. Foley says:

"There will be no changes at this time and there are no anticipated changes. We take the children where we find them and give them the best education we can."

Milwaukee does allow individual pupil transfers to other schools which have room and in some cases while classes, complete with teachers, have been bussed from overcrowded schools to buildings with space.

IN BOSTON, most of the 25,000 Negro pupils will attend predominantly Negro schools again this year despite a new state law aimed at racially imbal-from communities which do not correct the condition.

Boston is threatened with the loss of $30 million in state aid this year. But the Boston school committee has rejected the idea of bussing students or redrawing school district lines.

Mrs. Louise Day Hicks, a member of the committee and its former chairman, denounces the law as "unworkable and impossible."

"Mothers," she declares, "will lie down in the streets to prevent busing. I have not had a single call from anybody who wants us to redistrict and bus students so that we can get the money."

In 11 southern states, Negro enrollment in white classes reached 182,767 during the 1965-66 school term, or 6.01 of the school age total, according to the Southern Education Reporting Service which keeps tabs on the situation. In the 1964-65 term the percentage was 2.25 and the year before that, 1.17.

OF THOSE who attended integrated schools last year, 159,301 were in Florida, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and Texas. In Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina there were 23,466.

The service declined to estimate how many more would be admitted to previously all-white schools this year. The most optimistic guess by other educational observers was that the number might double.

Dr. Allen Smith, assistant state superintendent of education in Georgia, predicted a "dramatic increase over last year."

Floyd Christian, Florida state school superintendent, said "we expect a substantial amount of pupil desegregation in every Florida county.

South Carolina expected to have 12,000 Negroes in desegregated classes compared with 4,371 last year.

Miss Winifred Green, director of the Alabama school desegregation project of the American Friends Service Committee, told an interviewer:

"There will be more Negroes in previously white schools this year, but I think there is no doubt about it that it still will be token."

IN WASHINGTON, Harold Howe, U.S. Commissioner of Education, commented:

"Segregated schools, wherever they are, defeat the spirit and degrade the substance of our national dedication to freedom and equality.

"Too often, these schools provide inferior education — inadequate to meet today's demands, incapable of rising to tomorrow's needs and woefully ineffective in promoting good interrelationships among different racial sectors of our society.

"There is no perfect way to achieve progress in this area, no magic key that will unlock the doors that bar the way to equal opportunity in education, we must go ahead with the tools we have.

"Each city and school district must reach its own decisions on how to bring about educational improvement and truly equal opportunity."

Based on latest available figures, in Boston 50 per cent of public school enrollment is Negro, in Chicago 51 per cent, in Philadelphia 57 per cent, in Detroit 58 per cent, in Baltimore 61 per cent, in Washington, D.C., 90 per cent.

Joe Pollack, spokesman for Philadelphia's school board — affiliated office of integration and intergroup relations, said 40 per cent of the city's children attend private or parochial schools. Virtually all of these children are white.

"It is conceivable," said Pollack, "that the majority of white children in Philadelphia go to private and parochial schools."

New York City, which expects a school enrollment of about 1,091,625 this year, has been in turmoil over integration for years and has tried a series of futile experiments.

The enrollment breaks down into 28.4 Negro, 19.8 per cent Puerto Rican and 51.8 per cent other races. The snag is that the Puerto Ricans and Negroes are concentrated in specific areas, particularly in Manhattan, where their children constitute about 70 per cent of total school student bodies.

Of the city's 900 schools, 201 have Negro and Puerto Rican enrollmerts of 90 per cent or more.

In 1960 the city started an open enrollment program permitting pupils from schools with a high percentage of Negroes and Puerto Ricans to transfer to schools in predominantly white neighborhoods. Another experiment has been to "pair" Negro and white schools, busing pupils from one to the other.

White parents organized as the "parents and taxpayers coordinating council" set up two private schools in Queens rather than accept the pairing plan.

Chicago, another center of uproar over de facto school segregation, has so far insisted that in general students must attend neighborhood schools.

Negroes outnumber whites 258,835 to 249,478 in school enrollment, and in heavily populated Negro areas many schools are for all practical purposes segregated.

TRANSFERS are permitted from overcrowded high schools, generally Negro, to those with room available, generally white. But the city provides no transportation.

Benjamin C. Willis, superintendent of Chicago schools, was under fire for years from civil rights groups that accused him of fostering de facto segregation. He has resigned and will be succeeded on Oct. 1 by James F. Redmond, former superintendent of schools in Syosset, N.Y. Civil rights leaders are maintaining a wait-and-see attitude toward the new head man.

Cleveland, which has 83,430 Negro schoolchildren out of a total of 154,500, is using a $300,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Education to set up an integrated special training program in a five-story warehouse.

In Cleveland, 91.5 per cent of pupils presently attend schools with enrollments predominantly — 80 per cent or more — Negro or white.

School Superintendent Paul W. Briggs, defending the neighborhood school policy, says schools must be built "where the children are found and where the schools are needed."

Briggs says that what the Negroes want is "not bussing, but quality education — the best way to get the Negro out of the ghetto is to give him the tools . . . a good education."

Los Angeles, where one pupil in five is Negro, tried busing in 1963 to relieve overcrowding in Negro schools, but gave it up after one semester. The board of education said too few children took advantage of the project.

He says Negro school facilities are inferior to those in white areas, substandard teachers are assigned to predominantly Negro districts and there is overcrowding and de facto segregation.

"We can't seem to escape the prison of the ghetto, and education is at its heart," he said.

Philadelphia sought to counter complaints about poor teaching in predominantly Negro schools by permitting instructors to transfer voluntarily to promote racial balance in faculties. The response was poor and some authorities now advocate a mandatory transfer system.

Cliff Brenner, an aide to Richardson Dilworth, president of the Philadelphia school board, said special efforts are being made to locate new schools in areas where integration is feasible — that is, where concentrations of the two races live fairly close together.

Philadelphia buses pupils mostly Negroes, to relieve overcrowding, but has no policy of transporting them from one school to another for purposes of integration.

DETROIT, which has three high schools where Negroes make up 94 per cent or more of the enrollment and half a dozen with 90 per cent or more whites, is trying to break down the pattern with a permissive transfer system.

Negro dissatisfaction with Detroit schooling came to a head last April when 2,300 students at predominantly Negro northern high school staged a brief boycott. Placards displayed by student pickets said "we are tired of a third rate education."

Burton Gordin, executive director of the Michigan Civil Rights Commission, says:

"Many, if not most, Negro students attend inferior schools.

"They are inferior in terms of the buildings, which are usually older and inadequately equipped. They are inferior in terms of the teaching staff, which oftentimes has a higher proportion of inexperienced or substitute teachers, educationally unequipped to do the job."

MILWAUKEE has 93,965 white and 28,939 non-white school children. There are Negroes in 116 of the 148 public schools, but 81 per cent are concentrated in only 25 schools.

The Milwaukee United School Integration Committee, a civil rights group, accuses the school board of fostering de facto segregation by insisting in general that children attend neighborhood school.

IN BOSTON, most of the 25,000 Negro pupils will attend predominantly Negro schools again this year despite a new state law aimed at racially imbalanced classes.

The law defines a racially imbalanced school as one where more than 50 per cent of the students are non-white. It empowers the state board of education to withhold state aid from communities which do not correct the condition.

Guidelines Director Kruger Reassigned in Dispute Here

Georgia's controversial officer in charge of enforcing school desegregation guidelines has been removed from his job, according to an announcement in Washington Thursday night.

Stanley Kruger was reassigned from his post as area director of the school desegregation program in Georgia, South Carolina and Florida.

His new job is to head a unit for the grant and institute program, which gives federal technical help and grants to aid in desegregation of schools.

A regular replacement for Kruger has not been named but John Hodgdon will act as area director, Education Commissioner Harold Howe II said.

Kruger, a former math teacher, was called a "hatchet man" by Fulton School Supt. Paul West, who went to Washington to demand his transfer earlier this year. There have been continuing complaints that Kruger, who helped draft the 1966 guidelines, has demanded more than the law.

The announcement that Kruger was being transferred, came as Commissioner Howe made public a new grassroots approach to the problem of bringing schools and colleges into compliance with the 1964 civil rights act.

Howe said that for the first time personnel of the Office of Equal Educational Opportunities will be assigned to work out of regional offices of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Also, a unit of the office of general counsel of the department will be established to work with the equal opportunities office to coordinate procedures related to enforcement and litigation and provide legal counsel in connection with complaints and investigations.

Howe said staff personnel are being placed in the field in order to expedite action; reduce the number of requests coming to headquarters, many of which could be handled more quickly near the site of action; make more staff available for consultation; cut down travel time, and establish closer relationships between the office staff and school authorities and officials.

Lovett School Plans to Lift Racial Bars

SCHOOL DESEG.

Lovett School has ended its long-standing policy of admitting only white pupils and will begin to consider applicants without regard to race or religion in 1967.

The private school which touched off a segregation controversy when it once refused admittance to a child of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., announced the new policy in a letter to the parents of children in the school.

James M. Sibley, chairman of the school's board of trustees, wrote that "subject to limitations of space and facilities, those applicants deemed best qualified (three criteria were listed) will be admitted without regard to race or religion.

"Some three or four years ago," he pointed out, "your trustees took a position which was controversial but one which the board believed at the time to be in the best interests of the school."

He added, "Neither then or now have we allowed our personal views, opinions or prejudice to interfere in any way with the action that we considered wise for the school."

After the King child was refused admittance in 1963, the school also turned down applications of two other Negro children.

The Episcopal Church then severed some ties with the school, although it remained an Episcopal-oriented institution.

Sumter Says U.S. Has Tagged All Funds for Negro Schools

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 9/14/66

AMERICUS, Ga. — Sumter County School Superintendent Ed N. Bailey said Tuesday that all federal funds which the government is threatening to withhold from the county school system have been designated for Negro schools.

Bailey and Alfred L. Evans of Atlanta, an assistant state attorney general, will attend a hearing Wednesday before officials of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in Washington.

Bailey says he will argue that the school system has complied with federal requirements and that each pupil was given sufficient time to apply to attend the school of his choice.

The system was integrated last fall and has 40 Negro pupils in former white schools and two white pupils in former Negro schools.

The Negro pupils are attending former white schools at Plains and Leslie.

The white pupils are members of families who live at Koinonia farms, a communal farm southwest of Americus.

Bailey said that if the federal money is withheld, it would result in considerable curtailment of programs in Negro schools which were established last year.

He said that of $281,000 in federal money last year, the spending included:

—Two additional air-conditioned classrooms at each of the county's four Negro schools, about $60,000.

—Modern electronic remedial and reading laboratories at each of three Negro elementary schools, about $15,000.

—New science laboratory, including equipment, at Sumter High School, about $35,000.

—An audio-visual materials library in each of the four Negro schools, about $86,000.

—Establishment of a music program in the Negro schools, about $30,000.

—Free meals daily to children whose families have an income of less than $2,000 annually, approximately $26,000.

Bailey said, "Not only did students have the right to execute the freedom-of-choice plan during a 30-day publicly announced period this summer, but we also extended the transfer period for an additional 30 days to try to make sure that any student wishing to go to a different school this fall might have a choice."

Guides Probe by House Wins a Tentative Okay

AC. 9/21/66.

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—A group of Southern congressmen, including Georgia Rep. John J. Flynt Jr., watched in delight Tuesday as the House Rules Committee gave tentative approval to a proposal to investigate the new school desegregation guidelines.

The committee voted 8 to 3 in favor of a resolution to set up a five-member panel to study the legality of the new guidelines and look into the way they are being enforced.

But the committee members agreed to take a second, presumably final, vote on the measure Wednesday after it was pointed out that four Democratic members were absent and could not vote.

It was expected that the measure would win approval again Wednesday, despite the fact that all four absent Democrats are liberals who would probably vote against it.

One of them, Rep. Richard Bolling of Missouri, reportedly will be out of town all week.

Another Democrat, Rep. Thomas D. O'Neill of Massachusett

mas D. O'Neill of Massachusetts would be placed on the calendar before congress adjourns.

The resolution to investigate the new guidelines was introduced last April by Rep. George W. Andrews, D.-Ala.

An almost identical measure was introduced two weeks ago by Flynt, but it will be superceded by the Andrews proposal.

A basic of objective of the Andrews panel would be to determine whether the revised guidelines issued last April by the U.S. Office of Education conform with Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The Rules Committee deleted from the Andrews resolution a provision that would have temporarily rescinded the guidelines until the panel could report on its findings.

In presenting his proposal to the committee, Andrews said federal compliance officers have "gone on a wild spree" in enforcing the guidelines.

The Alabaman said he thought Southern school administrators were acting in good faith and "should not be required to go farther than the law indicates."

Andrews said the Department of Health, Education and Welfare feels "the only way to integrate in some areas is to bus students, and some districts have been ordered to do so."

Flint, citing the example of the Griffin school system which he has used frequently before, charged that compliance officer James H. Rich showed him at least four sets of instructions he gave school officials, none of which was alike.

"About the only thing these instructions had in common," the Georgian cracked, "was that they were in the same handwriting."

Later, Flynt said he didn't mind a bit that the Rules Committee voted on Andrews' resolution instead of the one he had introduced last month.

"I didn't know Rep. Andrews had introduced such a resolution," Flynt said. "But if it does the same thing as mine, then I'm all for it."

The guidelines, which have drawn heavy criticism from Southern congressmen and school administrators, received a series of attacks at Tuesday's session.

"Talk about Mussolini and Hitler," said Rep. W. J. Bryan Dorn, D.-S.C., "you have the blueprint right here in the guidelines"

Rep William M. Colmer, D.-Miss., warned that some day federal departments will "not only select faculties, but will prescribe books to be issued . . . if brakes are not applied."

WATCHES IN DELIGHT
Rep. John Flynt Jr.

But Rep. Carl D. Perkins, D-Ky., chairman of the House Judiciary education subcommittee, said he didn't think HEW was that bad after all.

"Sure," Perkins conceded, "U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe has gone overboard in some instances, but none of us is infallible. There are bound to be some errors in such a large program."

Perkins, whose subcommittee has jurisdiction over educational policy, said he would do all he could to correct any injustices.

House Panel Votes Study of Guidelines for Education

By JOHN D. MORRIS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — The House Rules Committee called today for a Congressional investigation to determine whether the United States Office of Education exceeded its authority in fixing guidelines for school desegregation.

By a vote of 7 to 4, the committee approved a resolution to create a special committee of five House members to conduct the inquiry.

Opponents of the measure maneuvered immediately, however, to bring about a reversal of the action. A motion to reconsider the vote was made. It will be pending when the committee meets again.

In any event, the resolution must be approved by the House itself before a special committee can be established.

The Rules Committee acted at the request of several Southern Democrats who contended that the Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, had "gone far beyond the law" in seeking compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Charges by Andrews

Title VI prohibits Federal financial aid to programs in which racial discrimination is practiced.

The Southerners' chief spokesman at a Rules Committee hearing, Representative George Andrews, Democrat of Alabama complained particularly of the application of Federal guidelines to bring about the racial integration of school faculties.

Representative Andrews also charged that Office of Education officials had ordered some school systems to transport pupils from one section to another to correct racial imbalance.

He testified that these and other activities "indicate that the bureaucrats downtown [in the Capitol) have gone on a wild spree, and they are demanding that school authorities knuckle under and comply with guidelines that go beyond the law."

Mr. Andrews is the author of the resolution calling for the inquiry and would serve as chairman of the special committee if Speaker John W. McCormack follows the usual procedure in setting up such a panel.

Also testifying for the resolution were Representatives W. J. Bryan Dorn of South Carolina, Jamie L. Whitten of Mississippi and John J. Flynt Jr. of Georgia, all Democrats.

Representative Carl Perkins, Democrat of West Virginia, testified that an education and labor subcommittee, which he heads, intended to make its own study of the matter. He argued, however, that the Office of Education had done a good job, on the whole, in administering Federal aid to schools.

The Rules Committee chairman, Representative Howard W. Smith, Democrat of Virginia, urged Mr. Perkins to sponsor an amendment to pending school-aid legislation restricting the commissioner's authority in school desegregation.

Mr. Perkins replied that the present law's provisions for court appeals provided adequate relief from any illegal administrative actions.

Four Rules Committee members, all of them Democrats who usually support the Administration, were absent when the Andrews resolution was approved.

If all of them should vote against it when the committee reconsiders, the resolution would be rejected, 8 to 7.

On today's ballot, the resolution was supported by Representatives Smith, William M. Colmer, Democrat of Mississippi, and the committee's five Republican members.

To conform with procedure under which members on the losing side cannot move to reconsider, Representatives John Young, Democrat of Texas, changed his vote from "No" to "Aye" and then offered a motion for reconsideration.

The opponents, besides Mr. Young, were Ray J. Madden of Indiana, James J. Delaney of New York, and Thomas P. O'Neill of Massachusetts.

The absentees were James W. Trimble of Arkansas, Richard Bolling of Missouri, B. F. Sisk of California and Claude Pepper of Florida.

3 REFUSE TO TESTIFY FOR TROT INQUIRY

Three owners of harness racing horses, one being a driver also, refused yesterday to sign waivers of immunity before testifying to a Brooklyn grand jury investigating a possible scandal involving the Roosevelt, Yonkers and Monticello tracks.

The three, who sought more time, were Benny Alaimo, Nicholas Seminara and George Sziklai, a driver-owner. When District Attorney Aaron E. Koota insisted that they sign waivers yesterday, their lawyer, William Sonenshine, applied to Supreme Court Justice Hyman Barshay for relief.

Justice Barshay ordered the three to report to the grand jury tomorrow and either waive immunity or refuse to do so. Refusal could mean the revocation of their racing licenses by the State Harness Commission.

Twenty-nine drivers, owners and track personnel did testify briefly during the day. Assistant District Attorney Irving P. Seidman announced that more than 20 men will be called to testify today.

Southern Governors' Unit Scores School Guidelines Enforcement

SCHOOL DESEG. 9/22/66

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

GILBERTSVILLE, Ky., Sept. 21 — The Southern Governors Conference passed a resolution today attacking the Federal guidelines for speeding school desegregation.

The resolution said the guidelines policy of the Office of Education was "clearly contrary to and goes beyond certain provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964."

It asked Federal authorities to keep the guidelines from exceeding the intent of Congress.

Several Governors of Upper South and Border States were absent or abstained from voting. The resolution was watered down considerably from an earlier version backed by most of the Deep South Governors.

Copy for Johnson

Copies of the resolution were to be sent to President Johnson, the House Rules Committee, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and the Federal Commissioner of Education.

The Rules Committee voted yesterday to send to the floor a measure to create a five-member investigating committee to explore charges that the guidelines exceed the 1964 act.

The guidelines, under which the Office of Education has pushed public school desegregation to record levels in the South this fall, have become a political issue in many parts of the region.

A measure of the concern the issue has aroused is apparent in the fact that the Southern Governors Conference, which ended here today, considered the resolution. The conference in years past has tried to avoid racial and other controversial subjects.

Offered by McNair

The resolution was offered by Gov. Robert E. McNair of South Carolina and promoted enthusiastically by Govs. John MacKeithen of Louisiana, Paul B. Johnson of Mississippi and George C. Wallace of Alabama.

In its first verison, the resolution strongly attacked the Office of Education's enforcement of the guidelines, accusing it of "assuming guilt until proof of innocence."

The earlier version called on the President and other Federal officials to stop "harassment and intimidation of school district officials in the absence of substantiated evidence that they are not complying." It also called for a Congressional investigation of the education office's enforcement practices.

Gov. Henry Bellmon of Oklahoma, the only Republican in the conference, who had left before the vote today, complained earlier that Federal officials had tried to require Enid, Okla., to put at least one Negro teacher in each of its 22 schools even though Enid has too small a Negro population to supply that many teachers.

'Clearly Contrary'

The resolution as adopted today read in part:

"Whereas the revised statement of policies for school desegregation promulgated by the Office of Education of the U.S Department of Health, Education and Welfare in March, 1966, is clearly contrary to and goes beyond certain provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; and

"Whereas administrative practices implementing these policies are inconsistent with the best interests of a quality educational opportunity for all our young people, which should be the high purpose and goal of this nation and the several states:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Southern Governors Conference that those in authority are urged to take immediate steps to require that the statement of policies for school desegregation not exceed the intent of Congress as expressed in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and those charged with the administration thereof act in conformity therewith."

Govs. Edward T. Breathitt of Kentucky and Warren E. Hearnes of Missouri abstained from voting. One negative vote would have killed the resolution because the Governors operate on a unanimity rule.

Governors Bellmon, Frank C. Clement of Tennessee and Charles L. Terry Jr. of Delaware had left before the vote. Gov. John Connally of Texas did not attend the conference. Gov. J. Millard Tawes of Maryland, conference chairman, did not vote.

Governor Breathitt was elected chairman of the conference for the coming year. Governor Johnson was elected vice chairman. Next year's conference will be at Ashville, N.C.

Senators Question Legality of Guides

SCHOOL DESEG.

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The powerful Senate Appropriations Committee said Monday it thinks the new federal school desegregation guidelines may be illegal, and called on Health, Education and Welfare Secretary John W. Gardner to re-examine them.

In a blistering report attached to this year's HEW appropriations bill, the committee said it believed the revised guidelines "contravene and violate" the legislative intent Congress had when it passed the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The committee also sharply criticized the actions of federal field representatives sent to Southern states to investigate civil rights compliance in schools and hospitals.

FIRST BY PANEL

Monday's report was the first major criticism of the new guidelines by any standing committee of Congress. The House Rules Committee is considering a resolution to investigate the guidelines, but so far has taken no action.

Significantly, only eight of the 27 members of the committee are Southerners. The rest are from Northern or Mid West states not directly affected by the compliance guidelines.

Georgia Sen. Richard B. Russell, the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, said he strongly supported the committee's statement on the guidelines.

NOT HEW FUNCTION

The report stated clearly it was not the function of HEW to promulgate "onerous education guidelines which contravene the legislative intent of Congress."

And it scolded the U.S. Office of Education, the HEW branch which issued the controversial guidelines, for claiming they had a legal basis in Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

To support its contention, the committee pointed to a transcript of debate on the Senate floor just before passage of the 1964 act, in which it said sponsors of the bill "interpreted the language and purposes of Title VI in no such manner."

The transcript quoted the then Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey as saying that Title IV of the bill precluded the Office of Education from using Title VI as a basis to require that local school districts act to relieve racial imbalance.

The committee members also said they had received "numerous complaints" about the actions of civil rights compliance officers during visits to Southern schools and hospitals.

Taken together, they said, the reports had "indicated an attitude of harassment rather than helpfulness."

"It has never been intended," the committee lectured, "that funds appropriated . . . be used (by HEW) to go about the country harassing people who have shown every indication of abiding by the letter and intent of the Civil Rights Act."

The report also told HEW that its field representatives should "achieve the image of ambassadors rather than inquisitionists."

Field investigators should be "carefully selected, thoroughly indoctrinated and rigidly supervised," the report stated.

The guidelines have been under constant fire in recent months from Southern congressmen and school administrators.

The House Rules Committee is now considering a resolution proposed by Rep. George W. Andrews, D-Ala., to set up a five-man select committee to investigate the legality of the guidelines.

The committee first approved the resolution by a vote of eight to three last week, but then rescinded its action to settle a jurisdictional dispute with the House Education Committee, which says it has power on this matter.

Georgia Rep. John J. Flynt Jr. has introduced a similar resolution which was superceded by the Andrews measure.

U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe is expected to testify at public hearings to be conducted by the Rules Committee later this session.

and that the President felt that the guidelines policy was the best policy.

Among those who expressed concern were Representatives H. Allen Smith of California, senior Republican on the Rules Committee; B. F. Sisk, Democrat of California, and Harold D. Cooley, Democrat of North Carolina.

Mr. Cooley called the busing situation in his home district "deplorable and intolerable."

Only yesterday, Mr. Cooley an nounced a grant of $219,000 from the education office for the school system in Rocky Mount, N. C. The last paragraph of the release put out by Mr. Cooley read:

"Approval of the grant seemed to indicate that the system has now been fully cleared for continued Federal aid under the Civil Rights Act, since the Office of Educaton is not now granting any new program funds to units other than those who are regarded as in compliance."

In a related development, Mike Mansfield of Montana, the Senate majority leader, called in reporters to explain his statement yesterday that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare had gone "too far" and "too fast" in compelling integration.

Mr. Mansfield said he must have misunderstood newsmens' questions yesterday, but "I assume the responsibility for the misunderstanding."

He also handed out a statement saying that he thought desegregation of schools was not going too fast—"if anything, it is too slow," with scarcely 10 per cent of formerly segregated schools being integrated" even on a token basis."

The Democratic leader said he was not advocating a slowdown in hospital integration. But he stood by a Senate amendment passed yesterday that would put patients of the same race together when necessary for their physical well-being.

The White House reaction to the Congressional furore over the desegregation guidelines and Mr. Mansfield's statements was both cautious and firm — neutral on Mansfield but endorsing H.E.W.

When the Presidential press secretary, Bill D. Moyers, was asked if Mr. Johnson was disappointed by the Senate's Democratic leadership, he replied:

"He knows that Senators are independent and have their own opinion."

Questioned about the guidelines, Mr. Moyers said this afternoon that the "President feels the guidelines policy is the best policy." He said that Mr. Johnson had already asked the health department Secretary, John W. Gardner, and the Justice Department to "assure that this law is implemented fairly, with justice to all concerned."

Mr. Movers added that President Johnson felt Mr. Gardner was "carrying out the law to the best of his ability."

There were other important actions on Capitol Hill involving education. The Senate Labor Committee passed two huge Federal education bills totaling $10.6-billion — about $3-billion more than the President had requested.

One $6.2-billion measure would extend the elementary and high school Federal aid program for two more years. The committee also sent a $4.4-billion higher education bill to the Senate for debate.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — A Congressional investigation into methods used by the Government to compel integration in schools and hospitals was pledged today by Representative Emanuel Celler of Brooklyn.

Mr. Celler, a liberal Democrat, promised the investigation for "immediately after the elections" on Nov. 8. He said that Southerners would be fairly represented on a panel drawn from the House Judiciary Committee, which he heads.

He made his commitment before the House Rules Committee, which had been planning its own investigation. The chairman of the Rules Committee is Howard W. Smith of Virginia, a racial conservative.

Mr. Celler argued that his committee, not the Rules Committee, had jurisdicvtion over such an investigation because it had shepherded all civil rights law to passage in the House. Many of the Rules Committee members agreed with him.

Mr. Celler argued that his committee, not the Rules Committee, had jurisdicvtion over such an investigation because it had shepherded all civil rights law to passage in the House. Many of the Rules Committee members agreed with him.

Representative William M. McCulloch of Ohio, the senior Republican on the Judiciary Committee, also said that its inquiry would be thorough and just.

Mr. Celler declared that the investigation panel "will be representative of both North and South."

"There will be proper representation of the So th," he said. "It wouldn't be fair otherwise."

At today's hearing, Southern Representatives devoted most of their time to attacks on new guidelines for enforcing desegregation and on Harold Howe 2d, the United States Commissioner of Education. Mr. Howe was roasted in absentia today. He will be grilled in person tomorrow at another Rules Committee meeting.

His actions were called "unwarranted, illegal, high-handed, tyrannical." His employes in Washington and the field were described as "arrogant and downright insulting," and the guidelines were excoriated as "harsh and exacting."

Administrative Law Seen

Southern Democrats and Northern Republicans on the committee agreed that the Office of Education had gone beyond the intent of Congress and was making civil rights laws rather than interpreting those passed on Capitol Hill.

Men of both parties complained that Mr. Howe's office had violated a specific prohibition in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by attempting to force racial balance in schools through busing students.

The White House reaction was, in sum, that it recognized the independence of Senators

State's School Boards Plan New Rally to Hit Guidelines

The Georgia School Boards Association (GSBA) said Friday a meeting by representatives of 11 Southern staes will be held Nov. 2 to map further plans to combat the federal school desegregation guidelines.

GSBA executive secretary Jack Acree said "substantial progress" had already been made to make the federal government clarify the guidelines.

Acree said GSBA would not take part in any move to undermine the 1964 Civil Rights Law but felt that the department of Health, Education and Welfare is "reading a lot into the law that isn't there."

HEW's office of education said the civil rights law gave it authority to adopt the guidelines which are designed to force school desegregation at a fast pace.

Acree said a progress report would be made at GSBA's annual fall district meeting beginning Oct. 31.

Acree said South Carolina Gov. Robert McNair has announced the intention to file a court suit on the guidelines.

Acree warned that in the meantime local school officials should refuse to conduct any business with HEW officials except at regular meetings with the minutes recorded.

He charged HEW officials have refused to give specific information to local school officials on the guidelines. He also charged HEW officials were "ineffective and inefficient."

Education Chief Defends Policy as Southerner Calls Him 'Misfit'

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30—The United States Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, denied under sharp questioning today by Southern critics on the House Rules Committee that he had overstepped his authority in his efforts to effect school desegregation.

As he testified, L. Mendel Rivers, Democrat of South Carolina, attacked the commissioner in a 10-minute speech on the House floor.

"This man talks like a Communist," Mr. Rivers declared. "That's why some of us who know him call him the Commissar of Education. The President should fire him."

Mr. Rivers called Mr. Howe "a misfit," "an idiot" and "ignorant."

William F. Ryan, Democrat of Manhattan, rising to Mr. Howe's defense, said he was "shocked" that a responsible member of the House would describe as a "Communist" a public official who was trying to carry out the mandate of Congress.

"I had thought that the days of McCarthy and McCarthyism were gone," Mr. Ryan declared. "It makes me shudder."

As Mr. Ryan spoke, Mr. Howe was facing his critics in the elegant green and gold chamber of the House Rules Committee across the hall.

The hearing, under the chairmanship of Howard W. Smith, Democrat of Virginia, opened on an acrimonious note. Mr. Smith, irritated by the crush of newsmen and visitors who jammed the small room, declared the open hearing closed to all but members of Congress and the press.

Then Mr. Howe's opening statement was delayed by a committee member, Ray J. Madden, Democrat of Indiana, who challenged the panel's right to conduct the hearing. Mr. Madden noted that it had been indicated yesterday that the House Judiciary Committee, which has legislative responsibility for civil rights, would hold hearings on the school desegregation guidelines in November. Many members of the Rules Committee had agreed yesterday that the Judiciary Committee, headed by Emanuel Celler, Democrat of Brooklyn, had jurisdiction over such an inquiry.

"This is nothing but a wildcat hearing in absolute violation of House rules," Mr. Madden charged. "This is nothing more than a propaganda meeting, a Roman holiday. It's inexcusable."

Mr. Smith ruled Mr. Madden's motion to suspend the hearing out of order.

Court Decison Cited

Permitted to read his opening statement, Mr. Howe said that the revised guidelines for desegregation issued by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare this year were intended "to eliminate dual school systems for whites and Negroes, systems being operated in violation of the 1954 Supreme Court [Public School desegregation] ruling."

The guidelines, he insisted, "do not mention and do not require racial balance or the correction of racial imbalance." He had not sought, he declared, to "establish racial balance."

Mr. Howe said his department's legal responsibility was to adhere to the procedures "and policies established in the Civl Rights Act of 1964 and supported by the decisions of the Federal courts."

Mr. Smith, speaking in a soft voice that nevertheless betrayed irritation, said:

"We have had a lot of complaints about attempts to cure imbalance, about your field people particularly. How can you do anything about this in light of Title IV — the opening paragraph of Title IV — of the Civil Rights Act, which prohibits you from doing this?"

Mr. Howe replied:

"We are not about such an enterprise; we want free choice to take effect. We are not engaged in any way so far as I know in establishing procedures for balance."

Mr. Smith retorted:

"If you don't know about the efforts of your department to correct imbalance you're the only one in the United States who doesn't."

Section Defines Term

Title IV covers desegregation of public education. The opening paragraph declares that "'desegregation' means the assignment of students to public schools and within such schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin, but 'desegregation' shall not mean this assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance."

Mr. Howe, puffing a pipe and replying calmly to Mr. Smith's questions, said the main purpose of the desegregation guidelines was to help school districts comply with Federal law so that they could continue to get Federal school aid.

Mr. Smith insisted that field representatives of the Office of Education were "harassing and hammering school people, telling them they've got to get some Negro children in white schools."

Busing Plan Spotlighted

Mr. Howe replied that there might have been a few such instances but that "in a very high proportion of cases" the field agents were following procedures authorized by law or Federal regulations.

"We are dealing with an area of tension and disagreement and occasional hostility," he said, "and in such a large system there may have been some mistakes."

John B. Anderson, Republican of Illinois, said he was concerned that neighborhood schools might be wiped out by a vast school busing plan Mr. Howe's office is studying. He pressed Mr. Howe on the importance of a draft bill proposing special Federal aid to cities that move toward better racial balance in schools.

Mr. Howe acknowledged that such a bill had been drafted for consideration within his department, but stressed that it was still in the idea stage and that he, too, was concerned about the loss of neighborhood schools. He said the bill "had no great standing with us in any official sense."

Mr. Howe denied that any busing that might be involved in such a plan was intended to be compulsory. However, he added that the Federal Government had a responsibility to try to help cities solve the educational problems created by the existence of segregated neighborhoods.

He also insisted that the Office of Education was not now engaged in any school busing programs. All such programs now in existence, he said, are arranged locally on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Howe was asked to return when the committee resumes its hearing next Tuesday.

Asked after today's session for Mr. Howe's reaction to Mr. Rivers's attack on the House floor, an aide said that the commissioner was somewhat puzzled because he had never met Mr. Rivers.

HOWE EXPLAINS

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Why Guidelines Upset the South

AC 10/3/66

By ART PINE

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The federal school desegregation guidelines, long considered foolproof political tinder in the South, this week touched off a blaze in the nation's capital.

Tuesday, Southern congressmen on the House Rules Committee will complete the second half of the investigation of the controversial guidelines which they began last week. When they are through, the House Judiciary Committee has promised to conduct a similar probe, this time a little less fiery, after the Nov. 8 elections.

Even before the House began its hearings, a Constitution reporter visited the Rules committee's star witness, U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe, to ask him why the guidelines seemed to spark so much resentment.

INTERVIEW EXCERPTS

The same questions asked of Howe were then put to his top civil rights compliance officer, Assistant Commissioner David Seeley. Here are excerpts from those interviews:

Q. Southern school officials have complained that your field representatives seem arrogant and often give conflicting answers on how to comply with the guidelines. How do you explain that?

Howe: There's a lot of tension involved in the administration of these policies. We're asking people to do things that go against many of their convictions.

In a couple of instances, we've been at fault. Some of our people in Oklahoma gave an interpretation that was not correct, and we called them back. I've apologized in some cases.

We took on some young people to work as field representatives this past summer. We gave them intensive training, but they're still temporary employes and they bring all their own ideas with them.

MANY 'EXAGGERATED'

Just the same, we've investigated all the complaints and most are vastly exaggerated. By and large, I think we've done pretty well.

I don't think our people are totally uninformed about Southerners.

Seeley: Sure, some of them can be overzealous. We're all human. There are differences in judgment. But in practical terms, it doesn't make any difference whom we send down. The message they bring with them is just not palatable to the school officials. And the school people just transfer their distaste for the message on to the compliance officers.

Q. The 1964 Civil Rights Act prohibits you from requiring racial balance. Yet your compliance officers frequently demand that school systems meet a certain percentage of desegregation before their freedom-of-choice plans are considered successful. What do you actually expect?

NO LABELS WANTED

Howe: We're asking school officials to do what's possible so that schools won't be identified as a "Negro" or "white" school. Since Negroes and whites live pretty well interspersed in most Southern communities, a free-choice plan that is really working properly will result in some movement of children.

The guidelines don't say anything about racial balance or imbalance, nor are we trying to construe them that way. The guidelines are essentially a gradual approach to the problem of desegregation. They allow the continuation of all-Negro schools temporarily in the South.

The percentages we've thrown into the picture are not there for racial balance. They're there to give us some measure of whether a free-choice plan is working. They aren't very demanding. There's some evidence that the school systems which are taking responsibility have no insuperable difficulty following the guidelines.

A ROUGH MEASURE

Seeley: The percentages just give us something to use as a rough measure of reasonable progress.

There's no fixed-and-fast formula for what constitutes progress. Last year, 100 school districts with freedom-of-choice plans had accomplished absolutely no desegregation. That wasn't very reasonable.

Actually, the guidelines are flexible and fairly lenient. It's hard to see how less could be required.

Q. One often-heard complaint

ON THE STAND
Harold Howe

ever, seems to be getting that topic on the agenda of the local school board.

If school superintendents would find a way to get the board to discuss the searching question of how to acomplish desegregation sensibly, this would help a great deal.

It would certainly be a more constructive attitude than asking "What is the least we can get away with?" A freedom-of-choice plan for desegregation just won't work without a constructive attitude.

Seeley: To bring about desegregation requires at least as much work with the community as passing a bond issue does; as we see it, under our system of local control of public schools, there's no escape for the school board itself to take this on.

SOME ELECTED

Q. What about the plight of the local school superintendent? In many Georgia communities, he's an elected official. By asking him to work actively for desegregation, aren't you asking him to risk his job?

Seeley: We're very sympathetic with that problem, and whenever possible we try to help the superintendents work it out. But if they can't we have no choice.

We don't accept the view that desegregation means allowing Negro parents to take on the burden of removing the "dual" school system — that is, the system where there are identifably we issued them, and naturally we contend they are legal.

EXPECT NO UPSET

If the guidelines were declared illegal in federal court, then we'd have to appeal the decision or adjust our policies. It would depend on the specific situation. But I don't expect that to happen.

SEELEY: In many respects, the guidelines are an exception to department regulations. They allow special gradual plans of desegregation. If there were no guidelines, there would be no gradualism. So, in a way, any attempt to abolish them is self-defeating.

Q. You've already said what you think school superindendents should do to improve relations with your office. What could you do on your end of the line?

Howe: Part of our problem has been that our staff is too small for this job. We've had to deal separately with 2,200 individual school districts. We very much need a larger activity and more funds.

I'm interested in working out a plan by which the states could take over administration of these provisions. This would take some of the workload off our shoulders, and also permit more to be done at the local level.

In that case, perhaps we could provide grants to help pay for this, if it is legally possible, for those states which are willing to assume the responsibility. We'd find ourselves then dealing primarily with state officials, and so would local school boards.

ATLANTA EXPANSION

We also need to give local school officials more help—perhaps to set up a special center where they can receive long-term help. We'd like to expand the regional facility in Atlanta, as well.

I'd hope that centers like these could be staffed by Southerners. And we need to get more Southerners as compliance officers. And if any local school systems want to begin demonstration projects, we'd be interested in doing what we can in this regard. Perhaps through funds under Title III (of the Civil Rights Act).

Q. So far, your major emphasis has been in the South. Will you be concentrating at all on desegregating Northern schools?

Howe: It's much more difficult to find how the Title VI of the Civil Rights Act applies to the North, since we don't confront the "dual" school system there.

Most of the Northern segregation crew grew not from public decisions, but from private practices, such as real estate patterns and economic differences.

POSITIVE APPROACH

We're trying hard—and not too successfully — to work out a basis in the North. But I suspect that in the North as well as in the South, what we've got to do is provide a positive approach.

Q. Some people have dubbed your office the "Office of Integration." Do you sometimes feel that's an accurate description?

Howe: Oh, we still manage to do a lot about education—like running a $3.5 billion program, for instance, and conducting research.

The reason for this image we've received is that the guidelines are the part of our program which seem to get the most publicity. The heat is in the guidelines, but the light is on the other side.

low the continuation of all-Negro schools temporarily in the South.

The percentages we've thrown into the picture are not there for racial balance. They're there to give us some measure of whether a free-choice plan is working. They aren't very demanding. There's some evidence that the school systems which are taking responsibility have no insuperable difficulty following the guidelines.

A ROUGH MEASURE

Seeley: The percentages just give us something to use as a rough measure of reasonable progress.

There's no fixed-and-fast formula for what constitutes progress. Last year, 100 school districts with freedom-of-choice plans had accomplished absolutely no desegregation. That wasn't very reasonable.

Actually, the guidelines are flexible and fairly lenient. It's hard to see how less could be required.

Q. One often-heard complaint is that compliance officers seen to base their judgments on the 441B compliance form school boards are required to submit. Is that all they use to declare a school system ineligible for federal funds?

Howe: No compliance officer has any business saying to superintendents that they are out of compliance. The compliance officer can suggest he thinks there are some problems in the way a free-choice plan is working. But only a federal examiner at an official hearing may declare a school system out of compliance.

We received several hundred forms which school systems had changed by adding amending clauses of some sort or other.

In each case, we've had to determine whether they were in compliance.

ONLY 39 SYSTEMS

Naturally, we've had to send some back.

All told, however, we've only cut off federal funds from 39 of the 1,772 school systems in the South. I don't think that's very harsh. Our effort is to keep as many people in compliance as we can.

Seeley: The 441B form isn't the final basis we use to determine whether to begin deferral proceedings. We've deferred funds (the last step before an official hearing to cut off existing money) in 74 school districts which have filled out their 441B forms correctly. The reason was that on closer look we found they were not actually in compliance.

At the moment, our administration system is getting after the worse offenders first. We'll be checking into the others later. In the meantime, before a school system takes its case to a federal examiner, about all the superintendent can do is take our word for it that he's not in compliance. It's just like speeding if the speed-limit sign says 60 m.p.h. and you do 75, you take the risk of being caught.

Q. Your compliance officers often use the terms "desegregation" and "integration" interchangably. But in the South, one means complying with the law, while the other often connotes promoting race-mixing. Are you asking school superintendents actually to "promote" integration?

MAKES THEM MAD

Howe: I agree that it's a mistake for us to use the term "integration." It makes people mad. They're never quite sure what it means. All we're asking for is some constructive way to help people get used to one another. The touchest job, how-choice plan for desegregation just won't work without a constructive attitude.

Seeley: To bring about desegregation requires at least as much work with the community as passing a bond issue does; as we see it, under our system of local control of public schools, there's no escape for the school board itself to take this on.

SOME ELECTED

Q. What about the plight of the local school superintendent? In many Georgia communities, he's an elected official. By asking him to work actively for desegregation, aren't you asking him to risk his job?

Seeley: We're very sympathetic with that problem, and whenever possible we try to help the superintendents work it out. But if they can't we have no choice.

We don't accept the view that desegregation means allowing Negro parents to take on the burden of removing the "dual" school system — that is, the system where there are identifably Negro and white schools. That burden belongs to school officials. What school people in Georgia should be doing is pleading with their state political leaders to help them out by making speeches and laying some groundwork.

The superintendent has a tough time complying with the guidelines; the state leaders are against it. And the general political action in Georgia has not given support to statewide activities of desegregation.

NIX'S STAND

I think your state school superintendent, Jack Nix, honestly believes the guidelines are illegal. If he wants to believe that, I can't blame him for fighting us, but it isn't helping local officials any.

By contrast, Florida and Mississippi have established state activities to help local school systems carry out the guidelines.

Howe: We must set this question in a larger context. Southern political leaders have made so many strong statements that have only made the superintendents' job tougher.

But one thing I don't think we've succeeded in getting across: The obligation to desegregate is a local obligation.

Q. Supt. Nix isn't the only one who's been questioning the guidelines recently. Several senators and congressmen have also said they thought the guidelines were illegal. What would you do if the courts ever declared them so?

HOWE: The whole business is talked about more as a political matter than a legal matter. We made every effort to check the legality of the guidelines before to be done at the local level.

In that case, perhaps we could provide grants to help pay for this, if it is legally possible, for those states which are willing to assume the responsibility. We'd find ourselves then dealing primarily with state officials, and so would local school boards.

ATLANTA EXPANSION

We also need to give local school officials more help—perhaps to set up a special center where they can receive long-term help. We'd like to expand the regional facility in Atlanta, as well.

I'd hope that centers like these could be staffed by Southerners. And we need to get more Southerners as compliance officers. And if any local school successfully — to work out a basis in the North. But I suspect that in the North as well as in the South, what we've got to do is provide a positive approach.

Q. Some people have dubbed your office the "Office of Integration." Do you sometimes feel that's an accurate description?

Howe: Oh, we still manage to do a lot about education—like running a $3.5 billion program, for instance, and conducting research.

The reason for this image we've received is that the guidelines are the part of our program which seem to get the most publicity. The heat is in the guidelines, but the light is on the other side.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

U.S. Education Chief Denies Any Bid to Control Schools

AC 10/5/66

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe denied Tuesday that the federal government is trying to take over local control of public schools, and blamed Southern political leaders for giving the people that impression.

Howe concluded testimony before the House Rules Committee, which he began in a session last Friday, as the committee fell one vote short of the quorum needed to decide what it would do next.

Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith, D. Va., said he would call another meeting Wednesday afternoon to vote on a resolution to set up a select panel to investigate the guidelines.

The Rules Committee had invited Howe to appear as a witness in its consideration of the proposal, which was introduced by Rep. George W. Andrews, Democrat-Alabama.

Howe told Rep. James H. Quillen, R-Tenn., that there was "certainly no attempt in these guidelines to take over local control of public schools, "and that his office had "never even considered it."

The commissioners said the only time his office exercised any control over local school districts was in cases of alleged discrimination.

Then, Howe said, "We are in the uncomfortable position of having to administer Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

It was in the administration of Title VI, Howe said, that the "impression has been created that there is a centralization of federal authority in overall education."

The commissioner said he thought much of the bad feeling the public has toward the controversial guidelines was sparked by "statements by other persons, often in high authority, who have used that to their own political advantage."

Actually, Howe insisted, "In our whole program we are trying to avoid federal control."

Then he told the congressmen of a plan under which he hoped some day to turn over administration of civil rights compliance to state authorities.

"If the job is done by the state," Howe said, "the staff then would be more acceptable to local school officials than some of our own field investigators apparently have been."

But, Howe pointed out, "We're going to have to look at this pretty carefully. It presents some real problems for the state school superintendents, particularly if he's an elected official."

The commissioner said his idea of a state administered program was simply preliminary, and he wasn't even sure whether it would be legal to give federal funds to state authorities to help them administer the program locally.

Meanwhile, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler, D-N.Y., who wrested jurisdiction over the guidelines back from the Rules Committee last week, announced Tuesday he had appointed a seven-member subcommittee to look into the guidelines.

Celler asked the House to appropriate $50,000 to pay for the investigation, which he promised would be "non-political" and not held until after the November elections.

The Rules Committee had ceded jurisdiction to Celler last week, but went ahead with its own inquiry anyway.

Celler's appointments include Rep. Peter W. Rodino, D-N.Y., who is expected to be chairman of the subcommittee, Rep. Robert T. Ashmore, D-S.C.; Robert W. Kastenmeier, D-Wis.; James C. Corman, D-Calif.; William C. Cramer, R-Fla.; Charles M. Mathias, R-Md., and Clarke MacGregor, R-Minn.

Liberal Rep. Ray J. Madden, D-Ind., again charged that the House testimony amounted to "nothing but a political inquisition."

And Rep. James J. Delaney, D-N.Y., told the committee, "There's no need for either our select committee or the judiciary subcommittee investigation. We've done all that in here today."

Questioned by Smith on the legality of the guidelines, Howe said they were sanctioned by federal court decisions handed down since 1964.

"Well," said Smith pointedly, "we can't investigate the federal courts so I guess we had better drop that subject."

Howe said he "certainly wouldn't call the guidelines law," however. "They are administrative aids," he said, "and nothing else."

A Justice department attorney also testified that the guidelines "do not have the force of law."

Howe told Smith the controversial guidelines were "simply a statement of how the commissioner will implement the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

When the 1964 act was passed, said Howe, then-Commissioner Francis W. Keppell had intended to use department regulations which are more stringent than the guidelines.

But, Howe said, "Local school superintendents asked for guidelines on how to proceed so we drew these up. They actually allow desegregation to come about more slowly."

Earlier, Rep. William M. Colmer, D-Miss., asked Howe if he hadn't been "an overzealous reformer."

"I'm just apprehensive," Colmer said, "that with your administration of the law that you are not able, because of your background or what, to be objective."

The Mississippian admitted to Howe, "If I were in your place, with my background, I would be subject to the same criticism."

Colmer told Howe he should administer the law without leaning either to the right or the left. "I think you lean to the left," said Colmer.

"Aren't you a bit disturbed," Colmer asked the commissioner, "that because of your zeal in this racial thing you have allowed yourself to become an overzealous reformer instead of merely an administrator?"

Howe replied: "I think I've had a little assistance in turning myself into this image of an overzealous reformer." His allusion was to the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

HOWE BIDS STATES ENFORCE BIAS BAN

SCHOOL DESEG.

Astonishes House Panel by Urging Less U.S. Control

By NAN ROBERTSON

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4—Harold Howe 2d, the United States Commissioner of Education, astonished a Congressional committee today by suggesting that states take over from the Federal Government the enforcement of antidiscrimination laws in school systems.

Mr. Howe, who has been attacked by Southern States' advocates in Congress as a man who "talks like a Communist" or a "dictator" and as the "commissar of education" and "a foul blot on the escutcheon of decency," issued his offer of decentralized control almost casually before the House Rules Committee. Its chairman is Howard W. Smith, Democrat of Virginia, an 83-year-old racial conservative.

The Commissioner said he intended to have his lawyers explore this "very healthy" approach of dispersing the obligations to carry out Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This section bans discrimination in any program assisted by Federal Money.

"I would hope to decentralize the responsibility for the enforcement of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act if we can find a way for the states to assume their responsibilities," Mr. Howe said.

"Have you ever made this statement publicly before?" Representative James J. Quillen, Republican of Tennessee, asked.

"No, but I have discussed it with my staff," Mr. Howe replied.

"Operation of Deceit"

Earlier, Mr. Quillen described the Office of Education, as "an operation of deceit" that withheld funds from some school districts while "deviously" giving money to others. He called the guidelines for desegragation issued by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare this year "the most dictatorial communiqué" he had ever read.

Of his decentralization suggestion Mr. Howe said, "I don't know about the legality of it," nor "if we could farm out our responsibilities under Title VI to the states."

During a hearing recess he told reporters that his office would have to maintain surveillance to make sure that states met minimum antidiscrimination requirements.

"That might be easier than riding herd on 2,000 systems," he added.

He was referring to school systems in 17 Southern and Border states.

The Office of Education has not attempted to bring about school desegregation outside th states that have a history of legally enforced segregation. The agency's position is that it does not have authority to use Title VI to correct racial imbalance that does not result from an overt school segregation policy.

Accordingly, the office has accepted pledges of compliance from those school districts that have never openly proclaimed a policy of segregation.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Howe explained that it was a "tremendous" problem to try to administer the antidiscrimination program "in a way that the local people find acceptable."

He had suggested during the hearing today that there be an "optional" agreement between a consenting state and Washington. He also had hinted that the Federal Government might provide "additional funds" so the state could hire the staff necessary to enforce the discrimination ban.

Asked whether he would allow a state such as Georgia to take over enforcement of antidiscrimination policies in the schools, he said the Federal guidelines would have to be adopted by any state agency.

He said there would have to be "minimal safeguards" that would include a complaint process with recourse to Washington. He said Negroes looked to the Federal Government for recourse, not the states.

A high official in the Office of Education said the decentralization idea had been under discussion for more than six months.

He added, "Nobody over here seriously thinks that any Southern states with the possible exception of Florida" would want to take on the job. But he indicated that it might give the office a better means of enforcing Title VI in Northern states.

During the hearing recess, Mr. Howe said:

"I haven't had a chance to talk to any state officials about such a possibility. It might be that some states would prefer not to get involved. But if a state did wish to, I can see a very constructive relationship developing."

Lands Proposal

Representative Quillen, who had earlier hotly accused the Commissioner of having "frandiose plans for federalizing our elementary and secondary schools," apparently believed that Mr. Howe was about to turn control unequivocally over to the states.

"An astounding admission," he said in the hall outside the hearing room. "the only good thing that came out of the meeting."

This was Mr. Howe's second and last day before the Rules committee, which is trying to determine whether it should establish a panel to investigate school desegregation policies.

Representative Ray J. Madden, Democrat of Indiana, called the hearings "nothing but a political inquisition," a "side shoe," a "farce" and a "filibuster" by Southern members.

The hearing ended in a closed session, but lack of a quorum prevented the committee from voting whether to ask the Hous to set up a panel.

U.S. Won't Use School Aid To Bus Pupils, House Told

AC 10/6/66

By MARJORIE HUNTER
(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON — The House was assured Wednesday that federal officials will not use funds in the administration's school aid bill to force racial balance by busing pupils.

The assurance was given as the House opened debate on a $5.8 billion two-year extension of the landmark program of elementary and secondary school aid enacted last year. Final action is not expected until late Thursday or Friday.

The Senate, too, opened debate late Wednesday on its own costlier version of the proposed school aid legislation. The Senate bill calls for $6.2 billion over two years.

BOTH EXCEED SUMS

Both the Senate and House versions far exceed sums sought by President Lyndon B. Johnson in the current fiscal year.

Under the House bill, the authorization for this year would be about $2.2 billion, about $500 million more than the President had sought. The Senate version would authorize $2.7 billion for this year.

The school busing question was raised in the House by Rep. Paul Fino, R-N.Y., and Rep. Horace Kornegay, D-N.C.

Noting that the bill would authorize federal funds for "pupil transportation services," Fino suggested this could lead to forced busing of pupils to achieve racial balance

Rep. Carl Perkins, D-Ky., floor leader for the bill, denied that there was any such intent.

"All we're saying here is, if a local education agency wants to spend money on transporting pupils it can," Perkins said. "The federal government can't force local agencies to bus pupils."

Rep. Hugh Carey, D-N.Y., said that the reference to pupil transportation services "has nothing to do with integration or forced busing."

CRIPPLED COVERED

The money would be available to transport handicapped and crippled children, he said.

Under the bill, the bulk of the money would go to school districts serving children of low-income families. Funds also would be earmarked for supplementary educational centers, purchase of books and library materials, and for the older program of aid to schools in areas crowded by children of federal employes and servicemen.

Pushing their drive for adjournment, Democratic leaders had hoped for a final House vote on the school aid bill Thursday.

But the drive bogged down when southerners, teaming up to help a colleague, forced five time-consuming quorum calls, requiring the clerk to call the roll of members. Each quorum call takes about 25 minutes.

The Southern strategy of delay, it was learned, was designed to head off consideration Thursday of a bill opposed by Rep. Basil Whitener, D-N.C.

The plan had been to take up the bill—calling for an agency to extend rapid rail system into District of Columbia suburbs—immediately following the school-aid measure.

Whitener has a speaking date Thursday in Chicago and wants to postpone the rapid-rail bill until his return.

Congress Approves School Aid

10/7/66 AC

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Senate and House passed companion bills to extend the federal school aid program Thursday, along with amendments that dealt a sharp blow at federal school guidelines.

The measures, which will be resolved by a joint conference committee later, included amendments that would:

1. Prohibit the U.S. Office of Education from deferring new funds from school districts without first asking a federal examiner to conduct a hearing to determine whether they are in compliance.

BUSING COVERED

2. Prohibit the commissioner of education from requiring school districts to turn to busing to relieve racial imbalance before they can qualify for federal funds.

Deleted in both houses was a provision that would have required the commissioner to give "special consideration" to applications for grants from districts which cannot meet educational needs because some of their schools are racially imbalanced.

The Senate version, which calls for a $6.2-billion program, was passed 54 to 16, opposed mostly by Southerners and Republicans, who said it allowed too much federal control over schools.

HOW THEY VOTED

Georgia Sen. Richard B. Russell voted against the bill; Sen. Herman E. Talmadge voted for it.

The House passed a $5.7-billion version of the bill, 237 to 97, three hours later after wading through 22 amendments.

Reps. Phil M. Landrum and Charles L. Weltner voted for the House proposal.

Voting against it were Reps. Howard (Bo) Callaway, Elliott

Hagan, Maston O'Neal and J. Russell Tuten.

Earlier, both houses rejected a GOP motion to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the amount of money authorized.

The Senate defeated 23 to 47 a series of amendments by GOP Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen, R-Ill., which would have cut $472 million from the bill.

Later, the House downed 150 to 185 a motion by Rep. Harold R. Collier, R-Ill., to cut $343-million.

Most of the debate in both houses, however, centered more on the controversial guidelines than on the budget.

Russell, in an exchange with Oregon Sen. Wayne Morse, said he couldn't support the bill because he did not think it was specific enough "to end the very definite confusion in the Office of Education."

The Georgian said that in his opinion, "having seen how the Office of Education operates, unless there is a provision in a grant application relating to busing or ending racial imbalance, the grant will never be approved."

Morse assured Russell that his Labor and Public Welfare Committee would "ride herd" on the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, especially on the role played by Education Commissioner Harold Howe.

"I have already served notice on Commissioner Howe," Morse said, "that we will give him an opportunity in a hearing to explain some of the complaints that have been made."

Morse's hearing will be the third in which Howe will have been involved in this session of Congress.

The commissioner appeared last week before the House Rules Committee and is scheduled to present his case to a House Judiciary subcommittee after the November elections.

Howe also was castigated in the House Thursday when Alabama Rep. George W. Andrews announced he would introduce an amendment to prevent him from cutting off funds to overcome racial inbalance.

Rep. Hugh L. Carey, D-N.Y., who explained that existing laws forbid Howe to do this anyway, jumped to his defense.

"Don't let this bill become involved in election year jitters," Carey warned.

The amendment did not pass.

Also rejected was a proposal by Rep. Albert W. Watson, R-S.C., which would have barred expenditure of any federal school funds until Howe was dismissed from office.

Georgia's Rep. Callaway said he voted against the measure "so as not to strengthen the club Howe has over our heads."

The Pine Mountain representative said he considered a vote for the bill a vote for Howe. "I'm not for Howe and not for the guidelines," Callaway said.

Wilkins Critical of School Aid Change

SCHOOL DESEG. NYT 10/8/66

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the N.A.A.C.P., criticized yesterday an amendment to the school aid bill as "the latest and perhaps most devastating blow in the current campaign to destroy the civil rights advances of the last few years."

The Southern-sponsored amendment, passed in the House of Representatives on Thursday, would require a hearing before the Government could withhold funds from school districts that violated desegretation guidelines.

In a statement issued from his New York City office, the director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said that the amendment "would make it impossible for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, without protracted hearings, to withhold funds from schools that discriminate."

He added:

"It is an extension of the ongoing attack on the school desegregation guidelines and on Commissioner of Education Harold Howe 2d."

Mr. Withins, who also spoke for the 83-organization Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which lobbies for rights legislation, called upon Congress, President Johnson and the American people for support.

He asked that Congress "defend their own laws and reject the crippling amendments of the last two weeks," that Mr. Johnson stand behind Mr. Howe and that the nation as a whole "recognize that nothing can create more disrespect for law than the vilification of public officials trying to uphold it."

The amendment, approved by a 113-to-63 nonrecorded vote, could be reversed by a roll-call vote.

Mr. Wilkins said that the recent attacks on Mr. Howe were aimed at getting rid of the commissioner because he had outspokenly called for compliance with the law.

Mr. Wilkins attacked as "thoroughly baseless" the recent statements that the Department of Health was too harsh in its administration of the guidelines and was moving too fast.

"When after 12 years only 8 per cent of the Southern schools are desegregated, no one can say we are going too fast," Mr. Wilkins said.

"And no one can say H. E. W. has pushed desegregation too vigorously, when despite widely documented violations, it has withheld funds from only 89 of 7,000 hospitals and 37 of 1,800 Southern school districts."

The civil rights leader predicted that if the amendment stood, it would bring about unwanted reactions from elements of both the Negro and white community.

"Its own [Congress's] abuse of the legisltive process can only feed unrest and disillusionment among Negroes and spur the bigots of the North and the South to new excesses," he said.

The Administration had sought a $1.75-billion extension for the current fiscal year of the year-old program of aid to elementary and secondary schools.

The Senate passed on Thursday a bill that would authorize $6.4-billion for the next two years. Still in debate, however, is the House version, which is expected to authorize $5.8-billion over the same two-year period.

In a related matter, a spokesman for Mr. Wilkins declined to comment yesterday on the activities of militant young N.A.A.C.P. officials in Milwaukee, pending a special meeting between Mr. Wilkins, officials of the Fraternal Order of Eagles and the youts on Oct. 19th.

The N.A.A.C.P. Youth Council has picketed the homes of officials who belonged to the all-white organization.

In recent days, council members have been sitting in cars outside the homes of police officials. They say that the police have been maintaining a similar and unnecessary watc on their headquarters.

Repeal of Curb on Federal Aid Feared by Officials

10/9/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — There is concern within the Administration that the most far-reaching desegregation law — Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 — is in danger of repeal.

Bit by bit, both houses of Congress have been chipping away at Title VI, which is intended to prohibit racial discrimination in any federally assisted program. This has had an adverse effect on enforcement.

"Now when we call on Southern school officials for compliance, they just laugh at us," an official in the Office of Education saidi. "They feel they have the rest of the country on their side now."

On Thursday, the House voted, 220 to 116, to require a hearing in advance of any Office of Education move to delay Federal funds to any school district suspected of practicing discrimination.

Segregation for Health

Earlier, the Senate had voted by a substantial margin to let physicians decide whether a patient should be assigned to a segregated hospital room for his health or well-being.

Both houses agreed to cut the appropriation for civil rights enforcement by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare by $927,000. These actions are subject to approval in conference committee.

In addition, the department and the Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, have been under fire by members of Congress from both the South and the North, who say the administrators are going beyond the law in the enforcement of Title VI.

Some officials within the department believe that damage to Title VI so far is more psychological than substantative.

The House Amendment on schools, for instance, could be harder on the school districts than on the Federal Government. The Government would have to terminate funds sooner for noncomplying districts rather than to delay funds and work with the districts to achieve compliance.

But some Administration officials believe Congress is not yet through with Title VI.

"We believe there will be more attempts to weaken it," one official said. "A lot of people would like to see it re-

The House Amendment on schools, for instance, could be harder on the school districts than on the Federal Government. The Government would have to terminate funds sooner for noncomplying districts rather than to delay funds and work with the districts to achieve compliance.

But some Administration officials believe Congress is not yet through with Title VI.

"We believe there will be more attempts to weaken it," one official said. "A lot of people would like to see it repealed or gradually eroded away."

New opposition to Title VI, as heard almost daily on Capitol Hill, is making a difficult enforcement task even harder, a spokesman for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare said.

Title VI has been called the atomic bomb of civil rights. If it were invoked in regard to every Federal dollar, as it could be in all but a few cases, it could be felt in almost every fabric of the society.

For various reasons, the Administration has attempted to enforce it only in selected programs, chiefly schools, hospitals, and the Federal agencies.

Further, Title VI is not popular in the bureaucracy. Because it carries the power to withhold funds, it gets in the way of agencies that are trying to pursue their goals by making Federal grants.

Officials Cite Distractions

Many officials say privately they wish it did not exist. It involves them in the emotional area of race relations that they would rather avoid. And it distracts them from what they consider to be their major concerns.

The Office of Education is committed to integrated education as one of its goals. But there are those in the office who feel that civil rights problems have interfered with its major job of building quality schools, whatever the racial balance.

This week, Commissioner Howe proposed before the House Rules Committee that enforcement of Title VI in school desegregation be delegated to the states. He said this could be incorporated into general state administration of Federal education programs, if the states wished to assume that responsibility

The Federal standards and guidelines would have to be maintained, Mr. Howe said, and it is presumed that most Southern states would decline to take on the desegregation role. Nevertheless, some of the complaints about Federal control would be removed.

Enforced Only in South

Title VI has been enforced only in the South and border states, which have a history of segregation by law or official pronouncement. The Office of Education has made no attempt to enforce Title VI outside the South since last year, when it deferred funds to Chicago and was overruled by the White House.

The reason for the general assault on Title VI is that Southerners have mounted a campaign against it, and many Northerners are sympathetic for the first time.

Constituents voice complaints of "Federal control," and Congressmen are sentive to increased white resistance to attacks on neighborhood schools.

The main charge is that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is intent on achieving racial balance, while the law is aimed only at removing racial barriers.

In the Nation

Desegregation or Integration?

By TOM WICKER

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8—When the Federal Government, many decades ago, first began to intervene in the processes of the free enterprise economy, it was to prevent some of that economy's most flagrant abuses—for instance, through the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Gradually the intervention became more active until today, through its budgeting and taxing activities, the Government plays a positive—if not always successful—role in guiding and shaping the economy as well as correcting its abuses.

Something like this evolutionary process of Federal action also has been going on in the struggle to achieve Negro equality in American life, and not everyone is happy about it. Ever since the Supreme Court handed down the Brown decision in 1954, formally opening the Negro revolution, there has been debate on the question whether the Government's responsibility was to correct demonstrated injustices and abuses or whether, beyond that, it had an active role to play in creating conditions of social and economic equality. Should it, for instance, only prevent the segregation of Southern schools, or should t force their integration?

Debate Is Revived

This debate is being revived, and sharply, by a number of legislators, Southern and otherwise, who believe that the Office of Education and its Commissioner, Harold Howe, moved beyond the intent of Congress in an intent to achieve integration.

In fact, the Federal Government long ago passed the point of limiting its responsibility for Negro welfare to correcting legal injustices perpetrated in the South and elsewhere. It has not always had the success desired, and the scope of its programs, measured in dollars, has not matched the need; but the principle by now is embedded in numerous laws.

The antipoverty program, whatever its deficiencies, perhaps deserves historical recognition as the first Federal step in this direction. This plan for broad-scale community and Federal attack on social and economic ills was not presented or advertised as a program to assist Negroes but as one to help the poor achieve self-sufficiency and self-respect; in fact, many white persons are reached by it but almost all Negroes are potentially to be aided. The intent was to provide education, job training, jobs, decent housing—in short, not only to push open doors of opportunity previously closed but to help the Negro and others walk through to a better life.

The School Act

The Elementary and Secondary School Act, similarly, is not specifically a Negro program; but its primary aim is to improve the quality of schools and education in ghettos and poorer neighborhoods and the major benefits therefore are bound to fall on Negroes. If and when President Johnson's "demonstration cities" program gets off the ground, it, too, will be, in effect, a massive intervention primarily on behalf of Negroes.

Not only were such programs judged here the best way to attack the problem, they also have the advantage of quieting some of the latent opposition that, it is now clear, exists toward the idea of singling out Negroes for special, visible assistance—for instance, in the "busing" of students. They helped keep large responsibilities in communities and neighborhoods; and they provided Federal funds to finance the ideas, the energies, and the will power of local governments and groups that had been financially helpless to cope with their own problems.

On the other hand, the Government has not in every case found it wise to go beyond the idea of preventing abuses. After the Voting Rights Act of 1965, for instance, the Justice Department was criticized for not moving on a broader scale to get Southern Negroes on the registration books.

Katzenbach's Position

Attorney General Katzenbach took the position that it was his responsibility to open up the registration books and give everyone who wanted it a chance to register and vote; it was not his obligation to conduct major Federal registration campaigns among Negroes. Once opportunity was guaranteed, he argued, Negroes would benefit more, and more lastingly, if they accepted responsibility themselves, if they organized their own drives and motivated their own people. First results seem to have vindicated this attitude.

In Wilcox County, Ala., for instance, where Federal Examiners were appointed, it is estimated that well over 3,000 of about 3,600 newly registered Negroes voted in a primary last May 3. In another primary in Claiborne County, Miss., where a drive led by Charles Evers had resulted in registering 2,805 Negroes, 86 per cent of them voted; and in West Feliciana Parish, La., perhaps 1,300 out of 1,500 newly registered Negroes went to the polls.

Thus, the real question is not one of principle, but of strategy and tactics. It was never possible that the Government could merely "prevent segregation" without taking on the positive job of bettering the whole place of Negroes in American life. For segregation results no more from laws than it does from conditions, and to attack the laws but not the conditions would be to fight half a battle with half an army.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

South Stiffens Against Race Guidelines

10/17/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 16—A South Carolina school board thought the United States Office of Education was bluffing earlier this year when it handed down its guidelines for school desegregation.

But the county school superintendent took the office at its word and, after a bitter fight, persuaded the board to shuffle white and Negro teachers in 11 classrooms and put more than 200 Negro pupils in classes with whites.

Now the superintendent is afraid of losing his job. Recent attacks from Congressmen on the Office of Education and its desegregation policies, the superintendent confided recently, are convincing the school board that it was right all along and could have gotten by with far less desegregation.

Many other school boards in the South are coming to precisely the same conclusion, and thus the outlook for 1967 is for a noticeable decrease in the pace of school desegregation.

"I was just talking to a P.T.A. group" said Morris Clarey, superintendent of schools in Edgecombe County, N. C., "and I told them I saw a ray of hope. I thought this thing [desegregation] was going to slow down so we could live with it."

Already, an official of the Office of Education says, Congressional attacks have emboldened Southern school officials to stiffen their resistance to the office's desegregation "guidelines."

"Now, when we call on Southern school officials for compliance," he added, "they just laugh at us."

In Atlanta, Eugene Patterson editor of The Atlanta Constitution and a member of the United States Civil Rights Commission, said he also "is beginning to see a danger that the steady advance of desegregation may be interrupted."

"We may find ourselves struggling to maintain what desegregation we've got," Mr. Patterson went on, "and even fighting against a regression."

Congress entered the dispute between Southern school officials and the Office of Education after widespread complaints that the office was exceeding its authority under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

In recent days, Congress has cut enforcement appropriations for the office. The House, meanwhile, has voted to require a hearing in advance of any office attempt to delay Federal funds to any school district suspected of discrimination.

All of this, of course, indicates considerable sympathy in Congress for the white South, which insists in the main that the only thing the Civil Rights Act of 1964 requires it to do is to give parents a choice whether they want their childen to attend predominantly white or Negro schools.

Southern school officials contend, too, that if they have to go beyond freedom of choice, this would give the South far more integration than is the case in the North.

What's more, they warn, if the office can "dictate" the rate of desegregation in the South, it can do it in the North—a thought that has stirred some Northern sympathy, despite the office's open concession that it has no power to correct "racial imbalance" in Northern schools.

The South used the freedom-of-choice plan last year. And while the percentage of Negro pupils in classes with whites climbed from about 2.5 per cent to 6 per cent in the South as a whole, the plan resulted in a fraction of 1 per cent in such Deep South states as Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana.

Associated Press

Enforcement of desegregation guidelines in Southern schools—like this one in Louisiana—is slowing down as school officials increase their opposition to United States Office of Education directives. Parental resistance to integration has also been a factor.

After the Office of Education digested the figures early this year, it announced its guidelines. They said, in effect, that if Southern school districts were going to use freedom-of-choice plans they would have to make them work—that is, produce a "substantial start" toward abolishing dual school systems (one for whites and one for Negroes) in the South.

The fact that substantial numbers of Negro parents do not choose to send their children to predominantly white schools does not mean that they do not want them to go, the office added. In many instances, the Negroes may be afraid of violence, or of losing their jobs or simply afraid of angering whites by upsetting the status quo.

A survey by the Human Relations Council of Mississippi shows that such fears may not be unrealistic. After talking with a cross-section of Negro parents who sent their children to predominantly white schools last year, the council found that 28 per cent were "pressured or fired" by their employers, 7 per cent lost their housing, 22 per cent lost their credit at the bank, 5 per cent reported a cutback or an outright loss of welfare assistance, and 47 per cent said they were intimidated by threatening phone calls, flaming crosses or direct physical assault.

As the office of education sees it, the civil rights act of 1966 outlaws discrimination in schools. And in as much as dual systems are "discriminatory on their face," Southern school districts are violating the act—and thus are ineligible for Federal school funds—unless they are making "definite progress" toward merging the school systems.

A Feeling of Welcome

Thus, Southern school districts cannot meet their obligations just by sending out "freedom of choice" letters, the office says. They have to make Negro parents feel welcome, and if community pressure is heavy on Negro parents, then the school district ought to remove the "burden" from Negroes, and assign them to white schools, whether they choose white schools or not.

How much progress does the Office of Education expect? It said in its guidelines that school districts with 8 to 9 per cent desegregation in academic 1965-66 ought to double that figure in the current school year and that school districts with little or no desegregation would be expected to catch up with the leaders.

In addition, all school districts would be expected to start desegregating their faculties.

Publication of the guidelines, which the office insisted were flexible, touched off a torrent of protest in the South. Senator Sam Ervin, Democrat of North Carolina, set the tone when he complained that the office could not use percentages without violating the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which while forbidding discrimination in schools also says that its provisions are not to be used to correct "racial imbalance."

A recent series of interviews with Southern school officials indicates, however, that most were far less concerned about percentages than about the insistence of the Office of Education on faculty desegregation—at a beginning rate of about one teacher of the opposite race in each school.

"White people just don't want their children taught by Negroes," a school superintendent in Georgia complained. "And white teachers don't want to teach in Negro schools."

Tempers flared again when the Office of Education began writing, telephoning, and sometimes visiting individual school boards to speed the pace of pupil and faculty desegregation. Many Southern school officials began complaining of "undue interference" and "heavy-handed pressure" from the office.

How much pressure was applied?

In general, the office has concentrated its pressure on school districts that had less than 1 per cent of its Negro students in classes with whites last year.

In Edgecombe County, N. C., an area in the state's "Tobacco Belt" where segregationist feeling runs high, seven Negroes out of an enrollment of 5,000 Negroes and 2,500 whites attended desegregated classes last year.

Negroes liked their own schools and were not much more interested in desegregation this year, Edgecombe Superintendent Clarey said, and teachers were even less interested in being transferred.

The, during the summer, a team of six Office of Education representatives visited the county. Mr. Clarey and his board asked them how many Negroes they wanted in white schools and were horrified when the team said 800 might be a "fair" number.

After the team returned to Washington, it wrote Mr. Clarey and his board a letter suggesting that they might merge a white school with a Negro school. This also shocked Mr. Clarey—even more so, he said, because the team from Washington got the name of one of the schools wrong.

Mr. Clarey and his school board never did agree to 800 Negro pupils or to school mergers, but they did send "freedom of choice" letters out twice, and concurrently with the second letter they had Negro principals talk with some Negro students in an effort to get them to transfer. Finally, about 80 students enrolled this fall for clases with whites.

Mr. Clarey said he has left "some openings" for faculty desegregation, but so far has been unable to find teachers who are willing to make the change.

Looking back on his dealings with the office, Mr. Clarey said the Federal team was "polite," but did not understand Southern problems and was "completely brainwashed into believing that the salvation of America depends on total integration."

In Tarboro and Rocky Mount city school districts, which both abut the Edgecombe County school district, school officials felt less pressure from the Office of Education, primarily because more Negro students attended classes with whites last year than was the case in Edgecombe.

W. O. Fields, superintendent of the Rocky Mount school system, which had 140 Negroes in classes with whites last year, said he had received letters and a telephone call from the office, but that no specific figures had been mentioned for desegregation. Mr. Fields continued using the freedom of choice plan, and this year has about 250 Negroes in classes with whites.

"Up to now they [Office of Education officials] have not hindered us especially," Mr. Fields said. "I do not know what will happen tomorrow."

The Tarboro system had 53 Negroes, out of a total enrollment of 1,600 Negroes and 2,400 whites, in classes with whites last year. This year it has 88 Negroes in classes with whites, and has desegregated eight teaching posts—five in Negro schools and three in predominantly white schools.

Although Superintendent C. B. Martin received a telephone call from the Office of Education saying that he ought to merge a white and Negro grade, he refused to go beyond "freedom of choice." Even so, he says, he has not "felt bothered by Washington up to this point."

In Washington, David Seeley, Assistant Commissioner of Education, acknowledges that his staff has made mistakes—such as confusing the names of schools in Edgecombe County—but says this is because his staff is "too small" and thus has too little time to devote to a specific school district.

And some of the staff members, he said, are young and inexperienced. One staffer, he said, wrote a letter to a Georgia school board telling it that it "shall do this and that."

"I admit," he said, "that the letter made it sound as if we were a Federal dictatorship."

"We stay away from ordering anyone to do anything," he went on, "but we do cajole. It is better to cajole a school district, than just to cut off its funds."

DR. KING CLARIFIES HIS RACIAL STAND

MOVEMENT

Says He Backs Only Part of Black Power Statement

10/17/66

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 16 — The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. clarified his position today on the civil rights controversy over black power.

He said that he had endorsed the four major principles contained in a statement of principles repudiating black power concepts isued last week by several Negro leaders, including the heads of the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

But he said he had not endorsed the entire manifesto and declined to sign it because he feared it might be interpreted by the press and public as an attempt to "excommunicate" from the civil rights movement such black power-oriented organizations as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality.

In recent days, Dr. King has said that he both supports and does not support the statement issued by the Negro civil rights leaders. A week ago, he said he was going to meet with advisers to determine whether he should repudiate the student committee and CORE.

Won't Repudiate Groups

He held the meeting but said today that he did not want to be part of any repudiation attempt.

The statement, titled "Crisis and Commitment," was published in an advertisement in The New York Times on Oct. 14 but did not carry Dr. King's signature. The statement, by implication, repudiated black power concepts. It was signed [illegible] Negro lead-

No Sign of Reprisals Is Found in Gallashaw Case

William H. Booth, Human Rights Commissioner, with Mrs. Aluvita Dean at news conference

William H. Booth, the City Commissioner on Human Rights, said yesterday that he had found no evidence that "threats or reprisals" had been made against families involved in the Gallashaw case.

"There have been rumors in this community about threats, about fear and about people moving out," Mr. Booth said. He spoke at a news conference at the "little City Hall" at 715 Riverdale Avenue, in the East New York section of Brooklyn, near where 10-year-old Eric Dean was killed during racial tension last summer.

Ernest Gallashaw, 17, who had been accused of murdering young Dean, was acquitted Thrursday night in State Supreme Court, Brooklyn, after an eight day trial.

Mr. Booth said yesterday afternoon that he had met with Mrs. Aluvita Dean, the mother of the Dean boy, and with Mrs. Ernestine Gallashaw, on Friday and found no ill feeling between the two women.

Booth had announced that both women would appear at yesterday's new sconference. Mrs. Gallashaw did not appear, although Mr. Booth said she had told him she would.

As she stood next to Mr. Booth yesterday, tears appeared in Mrs. Dean's eyes when she said that she intended to move from the community.

"I am not afraid of anyone," she said. "Nothing else can happen to me now that my son is dead. I am moving because this area has too many memories of the death of Eric. Not because of fear."

Staff members of Brooklyn District Attorney Aaron E. Koota have been making plans to relocate the Dean family and families of other prosecution witnesses, but have refused to comment on the plans.

Panel Votes Guidelines Changes

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 10/19/66

WASHINGTON — Senate-House conferees approved a diluted substitute to an anti-guidelines amendment Tuesday, which would allow the U.S. Office of Education to continue to defer funds for new school projects, but force it to begin hearings within 60 days.

Sen. Javits

The conferees overwhelmingly rejected an amendment which Rep. L. H. Fountain, D-N.C., had added to the school aid bill, which would have prevented the government from deferring funds until a hearing showed a school district was not complying.

The substitute, offered by Sen. Jacob Javits, R-N.Y., requires education officials to begin proceedings for a hearing within 60 days after they notify a school district that its funds are being deferred.

The Javits proposal permits the Office of Education to continue to defer funds for 30 days after the hearing. At the end of that time, it must either restore the funds or cut them off permanently, according to the results of the hearing.

LENGTH OF HEARING

One hitch in the over-all 90-day period specified in the proposal, however, is the actual time it takes to hold the hearing.

Under the rules governing federal hearings, which require certain minimum waiting periods between steps, the least time for any deferral hearing would be 110 days.

Most hearings, however, last from five to seven months, an Office of Education spokesman said.

That means if the Javits proposal is interpreted at face value, it could be as long as nine or 10 months before the Office of Education is required to stop deferral for a school district judged "in compliance" at the hearing.

The Javits proposal was agreed to by almost all the conferees, including the six Republicans on the committee. The only exception was Rep. Ralph J. Scott, D.-N.C., who demurred.

The next question was whether the House, which voted 221-116 to include the Fountain amendment two weeks ago, would accept the Javits-sponsored substitute this week.

Republican conferees said they didn't think the GOP leadership would move to recommit the measure, as originally expected, but none would say for certain.

Rep. Albert H. Quie, R.-Minn., one of the conferees, said he thought the Javits proposal did little more than "shorten the period of harassment in which the Office of Education can badger local school systems."

But Rep. Charles E. Goodell, R.-N.Y., said he thought the substitute would "strengthen the enforcement of the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

MORSE'S VIEW

Sen. Wayne Morse, D.-Ore., who headed the Senate conferees, said he thought an important point was that the committee "reaffirms that the secretary (of Health, Education and Welfare) has the power to defer funds."

That point has been in considerable question recently in both House and Senate.

The Javits proposal was also apparently acceptable to HEW Secretary John W. Gardner, who had called the Fountain amendment "a serious threat to enforcement of the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

Peter J. Libassi, Gardner's special assistant for civil rights, said Tuesday HEW "can certainly live with the Javits substitute."

"I see no difficulties in this," Libassi said. "It only regularizes our enforcement proceedings. But now we have a definite procedure we can point to."

Libassi, who sounded relieved to have a specific guideline which the Office of Education could follow, said he thought the Javits proposal "guarantees to school districts the right they have been asking for to have a quick hearing on deferral."

Previously, the Office of Education has deferred approval of funds for new projects from school districts it thought were not complying. Deferral, though often temporary, sometimes lasted for several months.

The Office of Education procedures have not required a formal hearing except to cut off funds already authorized for continuing projects.

With the conference report ready to go to the Senate and House for final approval later this week, the conferees were still uncertain whether their action limited deferral to 90 days in all, or merely 90 days plus the five to seven months for a hearing.

Senate Puts 90-Day Limit On Deferral of School Funds

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 10/20/66

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate Wednesday approved a substitute anti-guidelines proposal that would limit to 90 days the time the U.S. Office of Education can defer funds for new projects from local school districts it thinks are not complying.

The House is expected to act early Thursday on the measure, substituted in a joint conference committee by Sen. Jacob Javits, R-N.Y.

The conferees had scrapped a stiffer proposal, introduced as an amendment to the school aid bill by Rep. L. H. Fountain, D-N.C., which would have prevented deferral of funds until a formal hearing was held.

Sen. Wayne Morse, D.-Ore., who led the Senate delegation, made a special effort Wednesday to explain the complicated Javits substitute which had confused so many conferees late Tuesday.

Morse said Javits intended to force OE to complete a formal hearing on compliance within 60 days after it gives a school district official notice that its funds are to be deferred.

A federal examiner would be required to decide by the end of the 60 days whether the district is in compliance.

Once the decision has been made, according to Morse, OE may only defer funds for another 30 days.

At the end of that time, he said, OE must either resume sending new funds to a school district or cut off all funds permanently, depending on the examiner's decision.

The Javits proposal had the effect of reducing the length of time OE may defer funds. Until now, federal officials have been deferring funds indefinitely, requiring a formal hearing only to cut off all funds permanently.

Republicans, who saw the provision as an antiguidelines amendment, said it would "shorten the period of harassment" between OE and local school districts.

Morse said Wednesday he thought the new restriction would probably increase the caseload of OE attorneys.

Noting that the Senate had cut $6 million from a recent OE appropriation, the Oregon senator said he hoped both houses "would be willing to look favorably" on OE's pending supplemental budget request.

Morse said he thought Javits' proposal "meets the main object of the House (Fountain) provision, that is that the deferral process shall not be abused."

The senator's explanation cleared away speculation by some conferees who thought Tuesday they had voted for an altogether different proposal.

Several conferees had told reporters they thought OE wouldn't have to begin the hearing until 60 days after notice of deferral, and that the 30-day additional period would not begin until after the hearings had ended.

That interpretation would have added another six or seven months to the entire deferral period, OE spokesman said.

1967 Guidelines To See Few Changes

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 10/22/66

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—Next year's federal school guidelines, still being drafted in the U.S. Office of Education, will be substantially the same as those which caused the controversy this year, it was learned Friday.

Compliance officials declined to talk about the 1967 guidelines, but two office of education sources confirmed that next year's version would contain "no serious modifications or retrenchment" on any of the major provisions that have drawn congressional fire this year.

The 1966 guidelines were said to "contravene the intent of Congress" by the powerful Senate Appropriations Committee last month and will be investigated by the House Judiciary Committee next month.

BIGGEST CHANGE

The biggest change planners are considering is to make compliance procedures easier for those school districts which are "earnestly trying to desegregate quickly," according to one high official.

"But," he said, "this will not mean any lowering of our standards in anyway."

Another OE source said his office hopes to be able to move more rapidly next year against so-called "bad" school districts, thanks to machinery set up by a conference committee amendment this week which forces federal examiners to decide on compliance hearings in 90 days.

PUBLIC NEXT YEAR

The guidelines are expected to be made public sometime in January.

A source said another change would be in the compliance teams the government will continue to send to Southern school districts.

Field representatives next year will be permanent rather than temporary, he said, and "we will have more time in which to recruit them."

The Office of Education has been criticized for the actions of some compliance officers last year, many of whom were law students hired for the summer.

~~TITLE VI~~ FEDERAL POLICY

HEW Planning Crackdown For Compliance on Rights

AC 11/21/66

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Despite recent criticism from Congress, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is planning a broader civil rights compliance effort for 1967 than ever before, HEW officials say.

A spokesman for Secretary John W. Gardner said the HEW chief has approved plans to:

1. Crack down on dozens of Southern school districts which the U.S. Office of Education says have not lived up to the pledges of compliance they signed in 1966.

2. Permit the U.S. Public Health Service to begin conducting the same kind of compliance hearings for hospitals that the Office of Education has been holding for schools to determine whether funds should be cut off.

3. Begin moving seriously against segregated welfare facilities, which so far have received little more than a scolding for not complying with the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

4. Branch out to enforce desegregation of all public and private colleges and universities which receive federal funds.

Although HEW compliance officers next year admittedly will be traveling wider and delving deeper, Gardner's staffers deny that the steps amount to any "big push" for 1967.

"In March," said one high HEW official, "the secretary ordered all branches to begin setting up the machinery with which to enforce the 1964 Civil Rights Act. This is just the result of that order."

In a sense, Gardner's 1967 plans will simply place each branch of HEW one stage farther along in its compliance program that it was last year.

The hospital program, hastily set in motion to meet the introduction of Medicare last spring, will be brought to the same level as the school compliance program was in 1966.

The welfare program, begun dramatically last week with the decision to cut off all funds to the Alabama State Welfare Department, will be about as sophisticated next year as the hospital program was in 1966.

And HEW's "program" for enforcing desegregation of colleges has up to now amounted only to official concern.

The most dramatic advance, officials say, will continue to be in the area of school desegregation, where the number of districts brought to a hearing next year is expected to reach at least 200—almost 2¼ times the 1966 figure.

Last year, compliance officers took serious action only against those districts which refused to go through the motions of signing the 441B "promise of compliance" form.

Those districts now aside, the Office of Education plans to go after the school systems it says signed the form but didn't live up to it.

Baker County, Georgia, was the only district last year which was brought to a hearing for "violating its pledge-of-compliance.

Where school districts show they are trying to desegregate, officials say, compliance officers still will be willing to negotiate.

But, said one civil rights officer, paraphrasing the secretary's instructions: "Any district that refuses to negotiate will get a quick notice of hearing. We're not going to fool around."

With all its talk about expansion, the office of education plans to send "no great army of troops," as one official put it, to descend on Southern school superintendents.

In fact, the new crop of office of education compliance officers is touted to be "all pros — none of the young law students who were sent to the South last year."

It was the law students, inexperienced youngsters who were hired to fill a crash program, who precipitated such strong criticism from school superintendents and congressmen last year.

Even some officials have been shaking their heads lately at stories of the youngsters' mistakes in sensitive areas brought out in congressional hearings and newspaper reports.

"But there are no more crash programs in the works," a Gardner staffer said last week, "and all our compliance people will be fulltime professionals. It should go a lot better this year."

Mindful of the dangers involved in moving ahead unprepared, Gardner has warned his staff he wants "no more Chicagos," where compliance officers roared in only to discover they would have to tip-toe back out.

"The word is," an assistant says, "don't do it until you're sure you're right — and then don't retreat."

On the other hand, Gardner is said to feel personally that the recent congressional hearings have falsely "misled" the public into believing there is a way out of complying with the Civil Rights Act.

Guidelines For Schools Being Altered

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Desegregation Policies Expected to Vary Little

By Robert Holland
T-D Education Writer

The U.S. Office of Education is revising its guidelines for public school desegregation in the South, but the policies are expected to vary little from those in effect this year, despite criticism from Southern schoolmen and politicians and a pending congressional investigation.

Washington sources queried yesterday did foresee one change however: the guidelines for 1967-68 will be issued much earlier than the set for the current 1966-67 school year, to give school superintendents ample time to study the document and make their plans.

Announcement of the guidelines is expected to come from U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) officials within a few weeks, probably early in December, the sources said.

Guidelines for the current school year were not issued until March 7, 1966, and this time around the federal agency is apparently anxious to avoid the charge that it doesn't give school administrators ample time to make adjustments.

Third Year

This will mark the third year the federal agency, a branch of HEW, has propounded guidelines which school districts must follow in order to comply with the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The first guidelines were announced April 29, 1965.

The major weapon in the office's arsenal of enforcement is the threat of curtailment of federal school aid. This is expected to remain unchanged, although it has met criticism, including that of the Virginia Association of School Administrators. The superintendents' group took exception to federal aid being used to effect a "prescribed racial balance" in a resolution this month.

Despite speculation about a possible softening of erating under court-approved plans, or because they have been accepted by HEW as being completely desegregated.

The superintendents' group took exception to federal aid being used to effect a "prescribed racial balance" in a resolution this month.

Despite speculation about a possible softening of desegregation enforcement because of so-called "white backlash," the word was that the upcoming set will be "substantially the same" as before with probably some increased emphasis on speedup of faculty desegregation.

With the commitment of top administration leaders to civil rights action, a backing down from earlier Office of Education desegregation policy was considered highly unlikely.

Nevertheless, the agency will be the subject of an investigation by a congressional subcommittee that has been appointed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

Celler named the subcommittee to study the operation of the school guidelines and said it plans to conduct hearings during December. Harold Howe II, U.S. Commissioner of Education, has already been questioned extensively about the guidelines by the House Rules Committee. He is expected to be called to testify before the new subcommittee.

During the first year of guideline administration, the federal office required merely a start in student desegregation. For 1966-67, this was altered to require more actual pupil mixing, with stricter limitations on the "freedom-of-choice" desegregation plans.

Minimal Start

The first set required a minimal start on faculty desegregation, which involved merely integrated after-school faculty meetings in some systems. In 1966-67, this was changed to require desegregated teaching staffs in most schools.

Although a cutoff of federal aid is the ultimate weapon, the federal agency has been more apt to threaten the action than to take it. A more frequent step has been to place a recalcitrant school system on a fund "deferral" status, which means that money for new activities is temporarily withheld.

In the two years of guidelines no Virginia locality has incurred a final cutoff of federal aid. Currently, seven of 138 localities are on the "deferral" status.

Thirty of the Virginia localities are not affected by HEW guidelines because they are op-

ALABAMA REBUTS GUIDELINES SUITS

SCHOOL DESEG.

2 Schoolmen Say They Will Obey Only a Court Order

NYT 12/2/66

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Dec. 1 —Two Alabama school superintendents testified today that only a Federal court order would force them to abandon their dual white-Negro school systems.

They were Robert E. Cunningham of Walker County and Benjamin C. Botts of the city of Jasper. Both were called by the defendant state officials to try to rebut the contention of Federal and civil rights attorneys that the state has interfered so much with local districts' efforts to desegregate that a statewide order is necessary.

Most of the school systems in the state have some classroom desegregation, but only 14 are under court order to integrate.

When the superintendent took the witness stand, both conceded that it would take Federal coercion to make them abandon such mainstays of the dual system as separate Negro and white faculties. Local districts have been under considerable pressure from the state government to resist faculty desegregation.

Head Start Cited

Henry Aronson of New York, an attorney for the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., asked Mr. Cunningham at the beginning of today's hearing before four Federal judges if he had done anything to desegregate his faculty.

Mr. Cunningham said he had begun a Head Start prekindergarten program with a desegregated faculty and he supposed that could be considered a start toward faculty desegregation "if it became necessary."

"And what would it take for it to become necessary?" Mr. Aronson asked.

"A court order," Mr. Cunningham replied.

Mr. Botts said the same thing when he took the stand.

Two Lawsuits Filed

Negro plaintiffs and the Justice Department are trying to prove, in two combined lawsuits, that official state resistance to Federal desegregation policy has been so consistent that only an order covering the entire state will finally abolish the dual system in Alabama.

In the two days of the hearing, they have brought out a series of instances of political pressure on local school officials by Gov. George C. Wallace and other state officials. For example, the Governor recently threatened to hold mass meetings around the state to expose local school officials who cooperated with the Federal Government on desegregation.

The court action was finally prompted by a state law passed in September at Governor Wallace's urging declaring illegal and void, in Alabama, the 1966 school desegregation guidelines of the Federal Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

U.S. Joins the Suit

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People immediately filed a lawsuit in Federal court asking that the law be declared unconstitutional and that the entire state be placed under a desegregation order.

About the same time, the Negro plaintiffs in an old but still pending desegregation case in Macon County asked for the same statewide order. That case is being handled by attorneys for the Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

The Justice Department intervened in the N.A.A.C.P. suit and joined both parties in asking for the statewide order.

To attempt to prove the coercive effect of state action on local school officials, Mr. Aronson asked Mr. Cunningham if he felt he should obey the state antiguidelines law.

"Yes, sir," Mr. Cunningham replied. "We feel it wise to follow the law of the state."

The two combined suits are being tried by two three-judge courts. A three-judge court hears cases involving constitutional questions. The plaintiffs in these cases charge violation of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment. A decision of a three-judge court may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court without going through a circuit court of appeals.

Wallace not in Court

The judges handling the Macon County case are Judge Richard T. Rives of Montgomery, of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, and District Judges Frank M. Johnson Jr. of Montgomery and H. H. Grooms of Birmingham. Hearing the new suit is another three-judge panel made up of Judges Rives and Johnson and District Judge Virgil Pittman of Gadsden.

Governor Wallace has not appeared in court. He submitted a written answer denying having interfered with any court orders for desegregation during the last two years. One upshot of the Macon County case was a court order in 1964 enjoining Governor Wallace and other state officials from interfering with desegregation.

The Governor in his answer conceded that he had protested the 1966 Federal guidelines on the ground that they violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

John Satterfield of Yazoo City, Miss., the chief defense attorney, expanded on that during today's hearing. He argued that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in enforcing the 1966 guidelines was trying to achieve racial balance in the schools and was requiring faculty desegregation—both of which, he said, go beyond the civil rights law on which the department bases its authority.

Facilities in Five Southern States Offered Hearings on Rights Compliance

By HAROLD M. SCHMECK Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2—The Public Health Service has started formal action that may bar some Southern hospitals from all Federal funds because of their failure to comply with the civil rights requirements of Medicare.

Seventeen hospitals that are still out of the Medicare program because of discriminatory practices have been offered hearings to review their cases. This is the first formal step in a series of events that would bar them from all Federal funds if the discrimination continues.

The 17 are among 59 hospitals that applied for Medicare accreditation but have been refused. Another 50 hospitals are still being processed by the Public Health Service on the question of their compliance with Medicare's civil rights requirements.

All the other hospitals among the 59 civil rights holdouts are expected to be offered hearings soon. The first 17 are in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Texas. Most are small hospitals, but a few are of substantial size. The largest is St. Francis Hospital in Monroe, La., a 373-bed general hospital.

While none of the 17 hospitals that have received hearing notifications is believed to be receiving Federal funds at present others among the 59 may be doing so, a spokesman for the health agency said today. Furthermore two of the 17; Clarendon Memorial Hospital, a 76-bed hospital in Manning, S. C., and Orangeburg Regional Hospital, 292 beds, in Orangeburg, S. C., are eligible to receive surplus Government property.

The 17 hospitals have been found ineligible for Federal funds specifically because they do not comply with provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Until Medicare, however, the Public Health Service lacked staff and organization to pursue compliance among all the hospitals of the nation, a spokesman said today. The staff was made available in connection with the Medicare program, which helps pay hospitalization costs for Americans over 65.

Practices Cited

The action now beginning can cut off discriminatory hospitals from any Federal funds from as many as 13 Federal departments and agencies.

Some hospitals, for example, might lose training grants, vocational rehabilitation grants or construction funds.

Title 6 of the Civil Rights Act bars discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin in the use of Federal funds. Federal aid to some school districts in the South has already been cut off on the ground of discrimination.

Discriminatory practices in the 17 hospitals include the segregation of patients in wings, sections and rooms; segregation in waiting rooms and dining rooms; absence of Negro physicians on hospital staffs, segregation in training facilities and failure of the hospitals to make public announcement of open-admission policies, the Public Health Service announcement said today.

The hospitals have failed to take sufficient action to bring themselves into compliance, the announcement said. Each hospital has been advised of the specific respects in which it is violating the Medicare civil rights rules.

Letters of notification on the hearings were mailed Nov. 25, according to a spokesman for the health agency. The hospitals have 20 days in which to respond. Any hospital that does not ask for a hearing or whose officers fail to appear for a scheduled hearing will be considered to have waived its rights to one. Federal funds can then be withheld.

Subject to Review

If a hospital does request a hearing, a Federal examiner is appointed to hear testimony and make a decision on the question of granting or withholding the Federal funds.

The examiner's decision is then presented to the chief of the agency granting the funds. Each decision is subject to ultimate review by John W. gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

Te health service has already certified 7,092 of the country's 7,452 hospitals as eligible for Federal funds, the announcement said. Some of the remainder are not eligible for Medicare for reasons other than civil rights. Among these are 251 that do not receive Federal funds for any purpose.

The 17 hospitals named in the health agency announcement today are: Fifth Avenue Hospital, Huntsville, Ala.; St. Francis Hospital, Monroe, La.; Gray Hospital and Clinic, Springhill, La.; East Bolivar County Hospital, Cleveland, Miss.; Kemper County Hospital, DeKalb, Miss.; Greenwood Leflore Hospital, Greenwood, Miss.; Forrest General Hospital, Hattiesburg, Miss.; Noxubee General Hospital, Macon, Miss.; Jefferson Davis Memorial Hospital, Natchez, Miss.; Newton Hospital, Newton, Miss.; Clarendon Memorial Hospital; Manning, S.C.; Orangeburg Regional Hospital, Orangeburg, S.C.; Hampton General Hospital, Varnville, S.C.; Dayton Memorial Hospital, Dayton, Tex.; Crockett Medical and Surgical Hospital and Crockett Clinic and Hospital, both in Crockett, Tex., and Baytown Hospital, Baytown, Tex.

Hill Gives Testimony Before Alabama Hearings Recess

12/3/66

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Dec. 2 (UPI)—A court hearing to test the constitutionality of Federal school desegregation guidelines was recessed today until February after the state succeeded in putting Senator Lister Hill on the stand.

United States Attorney St. John Barrett argued that Mr. Hill's personal views on the guidelines were "purely irrelevant and incompetent." But the four-judge Federal panel hearing the case ruled that Mr. Hill, who has been in the Senate since 1938, could testify as an expert on legislative action.

Mr. Hill then read to the court a report from the Senate subcommittee that appropriates funds for the Health, Education and Welfare Department, the agency that administers the guidelines.

"This committee," Mr. Hill said, "questions whether the guidelines contravene and violate the legislative intent of Congress in the 1964 Civil Rights Act [from which the guidelines stem]."

Headed Subcommittee

Mr. Hill headed the subcommittee that drafted the report.

Under cross-examination, the Senator was asked whether he had ever voted for any civil rights legislation.

"No sir, I have not," he replied.

Before the adjournment was ordered, the state also called several local and county school superintendents in attempts to demonstrate that Gov. George C. Wallace had not interfered with school desegregation.

Mr. Wallace brought about the showdown on the guidelines — which make Federal funds contingent upon compliance with certain desegregation steps — by having the Legislature declare the guidelines void in Alabama.

Circuit Judge Richard T. Rives told attorneys that the court would reconvene Feb. 3 for "more oral arguments." Noting the volumes of records entered as evidence, he gave both sides 30 days in which to file summaries of witnesses' depositions and 20 days thereafter to file briefs.

Consolidation of Motions

The case before the court is a consolidation of motions and suits dating to 1964. In the consolidated action Alabama challenges the guidelines laid down by the Federal agency; the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Justice Department contend that Alabama's law voiding the guidelines is unconstitutional; the Justice Department also seeks to strike down Alabama's tuition grant law, and a motion by Tuskegee Negro lawyer Fred Gray asks blanket desegregation of all state public schools.

Among state witnesses today were Francis J. Marshall, Lee County school superintendent, and Elvin Hill, superintendent of Shelby County schools.

They testified that their counties voluntarily attempted to eliminate dual school systems, and said Federal officials first accepted the plans ,but then made further demands.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Desegregation Rate Is Nearly Doubled

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE JR.

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON—The office of Education has nearly doubled the rate of desegregation in Southern schools, according to a government survey that is close to completion.

The survey will not be officially released for several days, but authoritative sources said Wednesday that it showed a substantial increase in the number of Negro children attending schools with whites in 11 southern states.

Among the most arresting findings of the survey was that hard core resistance appeared to have narrowed to five states of the Deep South—South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana—and that progress had been much greater in the other six—Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, Tennessee, Arkansas and Texas.

Overall, the survey showed that 10 to 12 per cent of Negro schoolchildren—300,000 to 350,000—were attending classes with whites.

This comparies with 5.2 per cent — or about 150,000 — attending desegregated classes in the region last year.

Last year's figures were compiled by the Southern Regional Council, a civil rights organization based in Atlanta. The Office of Education also conducted its own survey which showed that 7.5 per cent of Negro children were attending school with whites in 1965.

However, officials have since acknowledged that their 7.5 per cent figure was inflated by reporting procedures and that the 5.2 per cent figure was more accurate. This year, The Office of Education has brought its reporting methods in line with those used by the council.

On a state-by-state basis, the government survey shows that Texas ranks at the top with about 30 per cent of its Negro pupils attending desegregated classes, and that Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana are near the bottom with 2.5 to 3 per cent.

The highest of the five Deep South states is Georgia, with about 6 per cent. The preliminary figure for South Carolina could not be obtained Wednesday, although it is apparently around 4 or 5 per cent.

After Georgia's 6 per cent, however, there is a large gap to the other six states of the old confederacy.

At the bottom of this category are North Carolina, Arkansas and Florida—all with 12 to 13 per cent. The figures for Tennessee are not yet available, but in Virginia about 15 per cent of the state's Negro pupils are attending school with whites and the Texas figure about doubles Virginia's.

Officials in Washington say they are encouraged by the general progress, but they appear disheartened by the polarization between the five Deep South states and the more "progressive" six.

One consequence, in the opinion of administration sources, will be an increase in the number of terminations of federal school aid in those districts where desegregation records are poorest.

Officials point out that although a 2 per cent figure in Mississippi represents an increase over last year, it still means that only about 6,200 of the state's 312,000 Negro pupils are attending desegregated classes.

The basic weapon which the Office of Education may wield to compel desegregation is Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI relieved the government of the necessity of proceeding through the courts on a district-by-district basis by banning discrimination in federally assisted programs.

Rights Backer Supports Southern Complaints Against U.S. School Aides

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Dec. 8—A Western member of Congress consoled Southern school officials here today by agreeing that some employes of the Federal Office of Education may be going beyond the law in enforcing school desegregation.

"I intend to turn my attention to this in the next session," Mrs. Edith Green, Democrat of Oregon, declared.

Mrs. Green, chairman of a special subcommittee of the House Education and Labor Committee, was addressing a group of Southern school men who had appeared to testify before her subcommittee.

"We do not intend that the Federal Government shall exercise control over personnel and curriculum," she added.

Several of the Southerners had complained of intimidation by employes of the Office of Education in administering the controversial 1966 guidelines for school desegregation. Some said their school programs were being disrupted by arbitrary demands for faculty desegregation and for quotas to achieve racial balance among students.

Mrs. Green said she was a strong supporter of civil rights for Negroes. She told a group of liberal witnesses appearing later in the day that she agreed that school desegregation had progressed too slowly.

The New York Times

Representative Edith Green

"But I have strong reservations whether the Office of Education has the right to go beyond the law," she said. She added that the subcommittee had heard evidence that the office had, indeed, exceeded the intent of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 in its zeal to abolish the dual school system in the South.

Mrs. Green and Representative John N. Erlenborn, Republican of Illinois, heard testimony yesterday and today on problems of the Office of Education. The hearings were dominated by desegregation problems.

The two Representatives, the only members of the subcommittee, left tonight for Kansas City, where they will hold further hearings.

School superintendents and school board members from Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, North Carolina and South Carolina recommended during the Atlanta hearings that guidelines be made to conform strictly with the law and be applied alike throughout the United States.

Flynt at Hearing

Representative John J. Flynt Jr., Democrat of Georgia, attended the hearing today. He said an unnamed Federal employe had suggested that local officials at Griffin, Ga., Mr. Flynt's home town, use economic pressure to force a white teacher to transfer to a Negro school.

Transcripts of meetings between Federal employes and Griffin school officials were entered into the record. One related a demand by a Federal employe that their discussions be closed to the press and public.

"This is a very bad situation —an unwise abuse of authority," Mrs. Green remarked.

Liberal witnesses urged greater Federal efforts to do away with school segregation.

A joint statement by the American Friends Service Committee and the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., said the Office of Education's guidelines should be strengthened.

The organizations urged that freedom-of-choice desegregation plans be abandoned and that the guidelines be expanded to deal with "Northern-style de facto segregation."

They also suggested that the Office of Education start a program to inform Negroes of their rights.

"The burden for initiating desegregation is still on Negroes," the statement said, "yet many do not know what their rights are."

They also urged that the Office of Education increase pressure for compliance by cutting off funds to a greater number of recalcitrant districts.

"The fact that an estimated 88-90 per cent of the Negro pupils in the Southern states are still in totally segregated schools in this third school year since the passage of the act indicates the disappointingly modest progress which has been made," the statement said.

Mrs. John Williams of Wetumpka, Ala., a Negro mother, told of the harassment of Negro pupils in Wetumpka's newly desegregated schools. She said two houses had been burned recently after children from those homes entered formerly all-white schools.

After that, she said, others who might have sent their children to desegregated schools "were afraid of losing their jobs or being cut off welfare."

She sent her own children to formerly all-white schools despite the pressure, she said, but she added that it had not been a happy experience.

"My son Victor's arm was broken in P. E. [physical education] class," Mrs. Williams said. "The white kids laughed and said, 'Oh, goody, Nigger got his arm broke, it should have been his neck.' "

She listed several other acts of harassment and concluded, "Everything that has been going on has been reported to the Office of Education, but we are still waiting for some action."

Official Says State Lags in Integration

By WAYNE KELLEY
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12—Georgia is lagging in its school desegregation efforts despite almost tripling the number of Negro students attending classes with white pupils this year, an Office of Education official says.

The state now has approximately 22,605 Negro students in desegregated schools compared to an estimate of some 7,687 in 1965, according to a statistical study by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

On a percentage basis, Georgia went from around 2.4 per cent of all Negro students attending desegregated classes to 6.6 per cent. (Negro enrollment increased by 22,200 to 342,500 in 1966.)

David S. Seeley, director of the Office of Equal Educational Opportunities, noted that the percentage increase was "more than double."

However he added that Georgia was still "somewhat behind expectations on a statewide basis."

Mr. Seeley did not say what progress had been expected in Georgia. But Office of Education (OE) guidelines issued last March indicated that local school districts with percentages as low as 2.4 should boost their ratio by four to five times that figure.

"BY AND LARGE, Georgia is in the lagging group of states," Mr. Seeley commented, referring to five deep south states achieving less than 10 per cent desegregation this year. He noted that the state was at least at the "top of the lagging group" however.

Georgia ranks 7th among the 11 Southern states in the percentage of Negro students attending classes with white pupils.

The group of states showing the smallest percentage of Negro students attending predominately white schools were: Alabama, 2.4 per cent; Mississippi, 3.2; Louisiana, 3.6; South Carolina, 4.9, and Georgia, 6.6.

The 1966 statistics were based on data collected from approximately 80 per cent of the school districts in the South. Figures from 1965 were less accurate, based upon only a sample survey.

The Office of Education did not count the Negro students in virtually all-Negro schools, which OE defined as institutions with more than 95 per cent Negro enrollment. Several Atlanta schools are understood to fall into this category after tipping from all-white to nearly all-Negro schools.

THE STUDY showed that Negroes comprise 31.9 per cent of all of the 1,073,700 students enrolled in Georgia public schools this fall.

A total of 17,150 Negro students were enrolled in Georgia schools where they made up 20 per cent or less of the sudent body. Another 2,500 Negro youths were enrolled in schools where they were 20 to 80 per cent of the student population.

The low percentage of Negro students in desegregated classrooms is reflected in the number of Georgia school districts currently facing a cutoff of federal funds for failure to comp with OE guidelines.

A total of 39 Georgia scho districts are currently out compliance, according to O records. This total is secon only to Alabama and Mississip pi, which both have 53 system failing to comply.

Federal funds have already been cut off from Glascock and Toombs County schools. Twenty-six other school districts have been notified of a final hearing, and 11 have had funds deferred while negotiations continued.

Pairing Program in 8 Schools Beneficial to Pupils, Board of Education Finds

B. LEONARD BUDER

The city's controversial school-pairing program has resulted in substantial educational gains for the pupils in the eight schools involved in the experiment, according to a report issued yesterday by the Board of Education.

But the report also brought out that the four pairings—three in Queens and one in Brooklyn—had led to a large exodus of white pupils from the schools and that many teachers had serious misgivings about the program.

Started in September, 1964, as an integration measure, the pairings provoked massive opposition from white parents, including school boycotts, sit-ins and other public demonstrations. Some white parents in Queens set up a private school, which is still in operation, for their children.

Pairings to Continue

The 66-page report, based on an 18-month study, was released without comment by board officials. However, a spokesman indicated that the board had no plans to create additional pairings. The present pairings will be continued.

Under pairing—also known as the Princeton Plan, after the New Jersey community where the technique was first tried—a "community" zone is established for two nearby elementary schools, one largely Negro and the other predominantly white. All the pupils in the new zone attend one school for the early grades and the other school for the upper grades—thus giving both schools a better ethnic distribution.

Civil rights groups had urged the city to pair schools where feasible, as part of a citywide program to overcome de facto segregation in the system. White opponents formed a Parents and Taxpayers movement, now largely dormant, to fight for the preservation of "neighborhood" schools.

The paired schools are Public Schools 7 and 8 in Brooklyn; P.S. 149, Jackson Heights, and P.S. 92, Corona; P.S. 148 and P.S. 127, both in East Elmhurst and P.S. 112 and P.S. 111, both in Long Island City.

Reading Rates Improve

The study, conducted with the help of outside experts, found that pupils in all eight schools made significant improvements in their reading rates, as shown by the results of standardized tests.

"Very frequently the improvement attained exceeded the expected gains based upon national norms," the report said.

The greatest gains were made by the white pupils. The report noted that students who had higher achievement at the start — as did the white youngsters — generally outperformed those pupils of lower initial achievement.

The study also found that white pupils who remained in their original schools after pairing did better than those white youngsters who were sent to the formerly predominantly Negro schools. But both groups of white pupils "exceeded normal expectancy," the report observed.

The following breakdown shows how white and Negro pupils did on the comparison reading tests — the first administered shortly after the pairings took effect and the second given 15 months later, in May, 1966:

Third Grade: Negro pupils gained one year, eight months; white pupils gained two years, one and a half months.

Grade Four: Negro pupils gained one year, three months; white pupils gained two years, one month.

Grade Five: Negro pupils gained one year, five months; white pupils gained three years, four months.

Grade Six: Negro pupils gained one year, five and a half months; white pupils gained two years, four and a half months.

No figures were given for the first and second grades.

The "normal" gain, based on elapsed school time, would have been one year, five months for pupils on all grades. But school officials noted that Negro pupils in predominantly Negro schools generally were far behind this rate of progress.

To make the pairings more acceptable to the communities involved, the Board of Education provided extra services and supplies to the schools—costing an additional $122 a year for each pupil. However, many of the teachers in the paired schools who were interviewed during the study said the money could be more wisely spent improving neighborhood schools.

The study appeared to beat out the prediction of white opponents who warned that the pairings would lead to a withdrawal of many children from the schools.

The report said that the "discharge rate" of the paired schools during 1964-65 was 26.1 per cent of the total pupil register, and 21.1 per cent in 1965-66. The systemwide discharge rate is about 12 per cent a year.

Howe Aide Overdid His Job in Newnan

WASHINGTON—U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe admitted Wednesday that one of his compliance officers was "impolitic" last August in dealing with school officials in Newnan, Ga.

But he denied charges of a Southerner on a House investigating committee that federal representatives had "exceeded their authority" in Newnan or in Telfair, Henry or Spalding counties, Georgia.

An exchange over the Georgia incidents between Howe and Rep. Robert T. Ashmore, D-S.C., was the high point of the first day's hearing on school desegregation policies.

The seven-member congressional panel, an offshoot of the House Judiciary Committee, will continue its investigation thru Thursday.

COMPLAINTS CITED

Howe's comments came after Ashmore cited complaints involving compliance officer James H. Rich as examples where he thought Office of Education officials had "gone beyond" federal guidelines.

The South Carolinian said Rich ordered Newnan officials to reassign white teachers to Negro schools forcibly if necessary to help desegregate the faculty.

According to Ashmore, Rich told the Newnan school board that teachers who refused to transfer should be "blacklisted and driven from the profession."

Shaking his head, Howe said he thought Rich's comments were "certainly not approall parts necessary for recommendations to the U.S. Office of Education."

Under questioning from Ashmore, Howe said Rich had composed the documents only after the board asked him to suggest wording for an acceptable desegregation plan.

The reason the word "shall" was used in each paper, Howe said, was that Rich had intended the phrasing to serve as a model which the board could later adopt as its own order.

"These suggestions are frequently couched in language the board would use if it adopted the plan," Howe said.

He denied, however, that the paper constituted any attempt by Rich to "direct" local officials. In fact, Howe said, "the board probably did not adopt the plans."

NO DESIRE

Earlier, Howe told the subcommittee his office had no desire to interfere with local control of the schools.

The South Carolinian said Rich ordered Newnan officials to reassign white teachers to Negro schools forcibly if necessary to help desegregate the faculty.

According to Ashmore, Rich told the Newnan school board that teachers who refused to transfer should be "blacklisted and driven from the profession."

Shaking his head, Howe said he thought Rich's comments were "certainly not appropriate" and "overdoing it."

"They're not related to the guidelines," Howe said, "they're just impolitic."

The commissioner told Ashmore that Office of Education officials were encouraged to provide constructive answers to school desegregation problems.

'OVERDOING IT'

It may have been "a partial solution" to suggest that Newnan officials simply require the faculty to desegregate, Howe said, "but that last part was overdoing it."

The commissioner also conceded Rich had "misinterpreted" his instructions in August when he insisted that the press be barred from a meeting with Spalding County school officials.

"The confusion arose over Mr. Rich's interpretation of our instructions," Howe explained. "We have clarified them since them."

Howe's chief compliance officer, Asst. Commissioner David S. Seeley, said Rich had been assigned to other duties and "does not go on field trips any more."

The other Georgia incidents Ashmore cited, in Telfair and Henry counties, occurred when Rich handed school officials documents stating that Negro pupils "shall" be transferred to white schools.

The documents, titled "Recommended Plan for Enrollment of Students," set forth specific transfer instructions, teacher assignments and transportation orders.

The documents ended: "This plan is a package plan with the approval by the board of all parts necessary for recommendations to the U.S. Office of Education."

Under questioning from Ashmore, Howe said Rich had composed the documents only after the board asked him to suggest wording for an acceptable desegregation plan.

The reason the word "shall" was used in each paper, Howe said, was that Rich had intended the phrasing to serve as a model which the board could later adopt as its own order.

"But with local control comes local responsibility,' Howe said. The Office of Education is "obligated to withdraw funds from those districts where the local community has failed to exercise this responsibility.

"We have a clear legal responsibility," Howe said, "where there is no successful local compliance with the law."

During the hearing, NAACP Washington chief Clarence Mitchell telegraphed Ashmore to chide him for using the word "nigger" during his questioning.

Mitchell termed it "a calculated attempt to provoke ill will and discord.

"It simply adds fuel to the fires of racism that are burning in too many parts of the country today," Mitchell said.

Do-It-Yourself Kidney Cleaner Working Well

PHILADELPHIA (AP)—The artificial kidney has been used in Boston more than 900 times in patient's homes, proving it can be used just as effectively there as in the hospital, a doctor reported here Wednesday.

Dr. Donald Snyder of Harvard Medical School and Boston's Peter Bent Brigham Hospital said the procedure of cleansing waste materials from the blood of people whose own kidneys do not function properly has been used at home by 13 patients.

They undergo the treatment, known as artificial dialysis, every few days and their experience represents a total of 106 months of home therapy, Dr. Snyder said at a symposium on kidney diseases which opened here Monday.

In eight of the 13 cases, relatives were able to operate the machines after three-month training periods, the doctor said. The other five had nurses come to the home.

U.S. Aides Criticize 'Freedom of Choice' in Southern Schools

By NAN ROBERTSON

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15—The "freedom of choice" plan for desegregating schools in the South was denounced by high Government officials today as largely unfree, unfair, unrealistic, inconvenient and inefficient.

In addition, a top aide in the Office of Education told a Congressional hearing that Negro parents seeking to enter their children in previously all-white schools under that plan were sometimes subjected to a reign of terror unmatched outside the Soviet Union.

David S. Seeley, Assistant Commissioner for Equal Opportunities, said that "you would be hard put to find any place short of the borders of the Soviet Union where the population is as terrorized as some of the Negro people" in the most recalcitrant Southern counties.

Dual systems of all-white and all-Negro schools exist now only in the South, the only section using the so-called free choice plan. It means that a child of one race may choose to go to a school previously reserved for the children of another race.

Mr. Seeley told a House Judiciary Subcommittee investigating the administration of civil rights laws he felt "guilty" that he and his staff had perpetrated the court-coined term "free choice," when it was "in no sense really a free choice" in an atmosphere of oppression.

Citing burnings, shootings anc economic reprisals, Mr. Seeley added that the term gave a false impression to Americans outside the South, who had little idea of "what the Negro parent suffers in this situation."

It was not a choice between two typical community schools, but between a Negro school and a white school, he said.

The Education Commissioner, Harold Howe 2d, testified that the plan also unfairly "places the burden for desegregation" on Negro children and their parents.

He called freedom of choice, even at best, an "interim arrangement" and "not a good way to organize," with many elements of inconvenience and inefficiency.

"Unrealistic," Mr. Seeley added.

James C. Corman, Democrat of California, added some unflattering descriptions from the subcommittee side when he called freedom of choice "the only critical mistake" made by the Education Office in its desegregation plans. It was, he said, "inherently invalid" as a way of trying to tackle the problem of historically segregated two-school systems.

The Office of Education has, in general, permitted school districts to offer freedom of choice plans in order to comply with the 1964 Civil Rights Act forbidding Federal aid to any school practicing discrimination.

Mr. Corman said the plan was really "a philosophy to give a haven to a white child who wants to go to a white school and a haven to a Negro child who wants to go to a Negro school." It was inconsistent, he said, with the 1954 Supreme Court decision ordering desegregation of the schools.

He added that "Congress should look to new methods" for ending school segregation.

Although one can point to progress when the number of Negroes in formerly all-white schools goes form 6 to 12 percen of the total Negro polulation in in the South, Mr. Corman said, it also meant that "88 per cent of these youngsters are not getting their rights, and that's intolrable."

The California Democrat asked Commissioner Howe to give a "timeable" on how long it would take to achieve school desegregation.

"I hesitate to make a guess because it would be nothing but a guess," Mr. Howe replied. He added that it would be a good thing for the Educatio Office to devise long-range plans and objectives, which had not yet been done.

"We've been so engaged in separate battles, we really haven't had the time to consider the war," he said.

Guidelines Study Attacks Slowness

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 12/19/66

By ACHSAH NESMITH

The Southern Regional Council released a report Monday concluding that the U.S. Office of Education has not only been overzealous, as some Southern officials contend, but questions "whether it has been diligent enough."

Allowing a gradual end to dual school systems has given time for evasion, confusion and concentration of pressures on a few—often Negro students — but also Southern school superintendents who attempt to follow the law with hesitant support from the Office of Education, the SRC said.

The SRC, an independent biracial civil rights organization headquartered here, issued the report to provide what was termed a "clearer" choice on the desegregation issue.

The report cites intimidation of Negro children and their families and questions some desegregation statistics complied by the Office of Education, including those on Georgia. Office of Education statistics do not take into consideration whether Negro children actually stayed in the schools, but count merely those who attended the first day the report maintains.

"Sad reports came from many parts of the South of the discouragement in many ways, most of them unkind and illegal, of many such children from continuing in their freely chosen new schools," the report states.

Debate over the guidelines "has obscured the persistent attacks by terrorists and the cruel infliction of economic intimidation on Negro students and their parents," the SRC adds.

In areas where segregation has been requied by law, the report argues, the Civil Rights Act provision that the government can not force racial balance is used to put all the responsibility for desegragation on Negro children rather than school officials. Children who choose to transfer to previously all-white schools are intimidated into transferring back to Negro schools, the SRC said.

The reports finds the 1964 Civil Rights Act's provision that racial balance can not be forced "not relevant in the South until the pattern of de jure (required) segregation has been ended."

Observing that the arguments over congressional intent have allowed recalcitrant officials to haggle over percentage requirements while obscuring the real issue, which the SRC feels should have been whether or not substantial effort was made to eliminate discrimination and dual school systems.

SRC staff estimates of Georgia Negro children attending schools with white children come to 5.7 per cent, while the U.S. Office of Education reported 6.6 per cent. The SRC estimate for Arkansas was 14.7 per cent, compared to USOE's 15.9 per cent, for Louisians 2.9 per cent compared to 3.6 per cent and for Mississippi 2 per cent, compared to 3.2 per cent. Otherwise SRC and the U.S. office agree.

The report criticizes the pressures put on Education Commissioner Harold Howe by Southern congressmen, and on Howe's "submission" to pressures by the DeKalb County and Atlanta school systems, and to the manner in which Stanley Kruger was transferred from his job of enforcing the guidelines in this area, giving the impression that with sufficient pressure the Office of Education would give in.

Calling "freedom of choice" an "assumed name" under which dual segregated systems are allowed to continue with federal subsidy, the report calls the U.S. Office of Education approach "conservative."

"The guidelines in both 1965 and 1966 did not attempt actually to end the dual school system. They have tried only to make a beginning. In short, they accept a pattern of tokenism and gradualism," the report states.

The emergence of racism among Northern whites has encouraged Southern advocates of resistance who "believe that the rest of the country has come to agree with them on racial matters and that it will not be long before federal pressure for desegregation will dissolve."

Urging a clarification of congressional intent, the report also criticizes Congress for not providing the U.S. Office of Education with staff for enforcement.

Requiring 50 per cent faculty be Negro and 50 per cent white in all schools that have any Negro children would discourage white families from moving out of transitional school districts, the report concludes.

Fund termination is held off too long, the report declared, rather than being too hasty. "South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana (the most vocal of those complaining of overzealousness) had around 95 per cent or more of Negro pupils still in segregated schools," it notes.

SCHOOL DESEG

Negro Total In Integrated Schools Triples

The number of Negro students attending school with whites in Arkansas more than tripled this year, as compared with 1965. There are 19,500 Negroes in desegregated classes this year, an increase of 13,400 over the 1965 figure of 6,100.

The 19,500 Negroes represent 15.9 per cent of the state's total Negro enrollment, according to figures released by the United States Office of Education. In 1965, about 5.5 per cent of the state's Negro students were enrolled in predominantly white schools.

The increase in desegregation reflects the continuing impact of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the guidelines issued by the Office of Education to measure compliance with the Act. Under the Act, federal funds can be cut off to school districts not in compliance, and the Justice Department can file suits to end racial discrimination. A few Arkansas districts are feeling the impact of those provisions.

The Justice Department has sued two districts — Crawfordsville in Crittendon County and Junction City in Union County — in federal court and both have submitted desegregation plans under court order. They were among the five Arkansas districts that made no effort last year to comply with the Civil Rights Act.

For the other three — Bright Star in Miller County, Hazen in Prairie County and Humnoke in Lonoke County — the termination of federal aid has been ordered, to be effective in January. This does not relieve them of the prospect of a lawsuit by the Justice Department to require them to obey the law.

All other Arkansas districts have made at least some effort to abide by the law, but a few of them have not satisfied the Office of Education.

Proceedings to terminate federal aid have been started against Lawson and Strong in Union County, New Edinburg in Cleveland County and Wilmot in Ashley County. Termination of federal aid has been recommended by Office of Education examiners for Fordyce in Dallas County and Marvell in Phillips County.

Biracial Districts

The school districts are required to file detailed reports with the Office of Education on their desegregation plans and practices, and are requested to file copies of the reports with the state Department of Education.

Most of the Arkansas districts did file copies with the state and those reports are the source of the figures in the accompanying table, except not for the districts marked by x's.

The table shows the total enrollment by race, the number of Negro children in desegregated situations, the total number of fulltime white faculty members separated by a hyphen from the number in desegregated teaching situations and the total number of Negro faculty members separated by a hyphen from the number in desegregated teaching situations.

The table lists all 222 biracial districts—ones that reported both white and Negro students in the biennial school census last spring—whether they filed reports with the state or not. Some of them in their reports show no Negro students, which apparently is the result of the current trend not to keep records by race.

According to the table 38 districts have achieved 100 per cent desegregation while 12 have no Negroes in desegregated classes.

The Justice Department has sued two districts — Crawfordsville in Crittendon County and Junction City in Union County — in federal court and both have submitted desegregation plans under court order. They were among the five Arkansas districts that made no effort last year to comply with the Civil Rights Act.

For the other three — Bright Star in Miller County, Hazen in Prairie County and Humnoke in Lonoke County — the termination of federal aid has been ordered, to be effective in January. This does not relieve them of the prospect of a lawsuit by the Justice Department to require them to obey the law.

All other Arkansas districts have made at least some effort to abide by the law, but a few of them have not satisfied the Office of Education.

Proceedings to terminate federal aid have been started against Lawson and Strong in Union County, New Edinburg in Cleveland County and Wilmot in Ashley County. Termination of federal aid has been recommended by Office of Education examiners for Fordyce in Dallas County and Marvell in Philips County.

Five more districts are in a funds-deferred status while the Office of Education attempts to work out a satisfactory compliance plan with them. They are Dermott in Chicot County, the Conway County District, Emerson and Stamps in Lafayette County and Collins in Jefferson County.

The 1965 guidelines were rewritten last spring, and made stronger, which aggravated some Arkansas districts. The Dermott District finally sued in federal court seeking to have the guidelines held invalid.

Faculty Figures Not Yet Released

The Office of Education has not yet released figures on faculty desegregation, but available figures indicate that it has proceeded much more slowly than student desegregation. Figures from 151 of the 222 bi-racial Arkansas school districts show that only 119 white teachers are teaching in predominantly Negro schools — an average of fewer than one per district.

Far more Negro teachers are teaching in predominantly white schools. In the 151 districts, there are 203 Negro teachers in schools with a majority of white students.

As in 1965, the great increase in desegregation did not produce any incidents of violence, although several hundred Negro children boycotted the Marvell Schools for several weeks. They returned to classes, about 120 of them to desegregated classes, when Marvell complied with a federal court order to produce a desegregation plan.

Some attention had been created in the Washington District in Hempstead County where there was talk of a mass exodus of whites because of federal requirements that the District stop sending its white high school students to Hope and send them to an all-Negro high school at Washington instead. A majority of the District's student population is Negro.

The District has fewer white students this year than last — 33 as compared with 69 in 1965 — but white students from all four high school grades have continued to commute to school at Hope. Superintendent Thurston Hulsey said he was still waiting for a definite decision by federal authorities on whether the arrangement could continue.

Another district — Plum Bayou-Tucker in Jefferson County — has reported an exodus of white students in the face of Negro majorities in all the district's schools. The district has 100 white students this year, 42 fewer than in 1965.

MANSFIELD URGES SENATE TO REVIEW PAST LEGISLATION

LEGISLATION

Says 'Top-to-Bottom' Study Should Be Preoccupation of the 90th Congress

NYT 12/28/66

'A CHECK ON EFFICACY'

Letter to Committee Heads Seeks Basis for Changes in Recent and Old Laws

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — Mike Mansfield, the Senate majority leader, has urged the 17 committee chairmen in the Senate to initiate a "top-to-bottom" re-evaluation of major Federal programs, both new and old.

He said this should be the preoccupation of the 90th Congress, which convenes Jan. 10.

In a letter to the chairmen released today, the Montana Democrat said, "The time seems to me to be very ripe" for "a concentrated re-examination of major legislative structures by which the Federal Government is enabled to play its role in the current life and affairs of the nation and the world."

Much of the Great Society domestic legislation enacted in the last few years has "rough edges, over-extensions and overlaps and, perhaps, even signifianct gaps," he wrote.

Older programs such as agricultural subsidies, foreign aid, income taxes and the military draft have not had a "thoroughgoing second look for many years," he said.

Needs of Nation Cited

"A complete restudy by the Senate," he said, "could provide not only a basis for adjustment of legislation, as necessary to the current needs of the nation, but also a check on the equity and efficacy of the administrative interpretations and practices which have developed."

Senator Mansfield made a similar suggestion a year ago for the second session of the 89th Congress. He said then that so many Great Society programs had been enacted so hurriedly in 1965 that Congress in 1966 could well spend its time refining and correcting those programs.

But President Johnson continued to recommend major new legislation that kept Congress preoccupied most of the year.

Now, however, both the membership of Congress and the political climate have changed. The Republicans gained 47 seats in the House of Representatives, and in the process President Johnson lost the margin of support by which much of his Great Society legislation had been enacted.

There has been mounting criticism—by both liberals and conservatives—of the administration of many of the new Federal programs. Administration leaders in Congress concede that much of the legislation was drawn hastily and improperly.

"It occurs to me," Senator Mansfield said in his letter, "that the next Congress will see the convergence of a unique opportunity with a great need for a concentrated Senate exercise of the oversight function." He said he did not expect "requests for sweeping new legislative approaches in the 90th Congress."

"I would hope to see, in the first session of the 90th Congress, the beginning of a major re-examination of what we have done in legislation during the past few years," he said.

He listed as examples of programs he wants studied, medical care for the aged, expanded health research, civil rights, conservation and beautification, programs against air and water pollution and renewal of urban and rural areas.

"In short, what is suggested is that the committee chairmen consult with members of their committees to determine with respect to matters within their committee jurisdiction what, in their judgment, might be most usefully subjected to a thoroughgoing oversight at this time," he said.

"I do not anticipate much more than a beginning during the coming session," he commented.

The chairmen, all but two of whom are from the South and West, were expected to concur in Mr. Mansfield's recommendation. Senator A. S. Mike Monroney, Democrat of Oklahoma, who is chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, said:

"We are going to have some new legislation, but I am very glad that he has put the emphasis so strongly on review, modification and re-examination."

Questions:

1. In view of the fact that much of the legislation Sen. Mansfield wants reviewed is liberal legislation, and in view of the apparent reaction evidenced in the 1966 elections, does the call for a "review" mean that the administration wants modifications of a non-liberal nature?

Guidelines Upheld by U.S. Court

AC 12/30/66

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

By BILL CRIDER

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A federal appeals court set a strict pattern Thursday for desegregation of the South's public schools and said all grades should be open to Negroes next fall.

"The clock has ticked the last tick for tokenism and delay in the name of "deliberate speed," the fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said in its sweeping decision.

The court's landmark opinion accepted the controversial guidelines set up by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) as the legal standard.

The guidelines have been under attack by many Southern congressmen and other political leaders who contend HEW is pushing desegregation faster and farther than the courts ordered.

"The guidelines, of course, cannot bind the courts," the decision said. "We are not abdicating any judicial responsibilities. But we hold that HEW's standards are substantially the same as this court's standards."

HEW set the guidelines as the standard school systems should meet in order to remain eligible for federal aid, often a big item in school budgets.

A major factor leading to the appeal court's special hearing was that some resisting systems, in efforts to circumvent HEW guideline, were using federal courts as shields. Federal desegregation orders, in contrast to the guidelines, usually left procedures and details up to the local board.

"In Louisiana alone 20 school boards obtained quick decrees providing for desegregation according to plans greatly at variance with the guidelines," the court said.

"We shall not permit the courts to be used to destroy or dilute the effectiveness of the congressional policy . . . there is no bonus for foot-dragging."

Seven cases were involved in the special hearing. A proposed decree set forth for district judges applies in each case—and sets legal precedent for any other similar case anywhere in the nation.

"The provisions of the decree are intended, as far as possible, to apply uniformly throughout this circuit in cases involving plans based on free choice of schools," the decision said.

School boards involved are those of Jefferson County, Fairfield and Bessemer in Alabama and the Louisiana Parishes (counties) of Caddo, Bossier, Jackson and Claiborne.

MEAGER RESULTS

In these and other school systems, the court said, desegregation was accepted as a settled constitutional question but results were meager.

"The statistics speak eloquently. In 1965 the public school districts in the consolidated cases now before this court had a school population of 155,782 school children, 59,361 of whom were Negro. Yet under the existing court - approved desegregation plans, only 110 Negro children in these districts, 0.19 of the school population, attend former 'white' schools."

The court said its guidelines would be flexible.

"School boards, private plaintiffs and the United States may, of course, come into court to prove that exceptional circumstances compel modification of the decree."

CAN ASK AID

In such cases, the court added, "district courts may call upon HEW for assistance in determining whether a school's performance measures up to its promises."

In the decree, speed of desegregation was defined as:

"Commencing wtih the 1967-68 school year, in accordance with this decree, all grades, including kindergarten grades, shall be desegregated and pupils assigned to schools in these grades without regard to race or color."

HEW guidelines also require school boards to assign and hire teachers without regard to race or color, and that school buses be desegregated.

The opinion struck specifically at a common defense contention that the Supreme Court "does not require integration, it merely forbids segregation."

The basis of this argument was the Briggs decision, involving Clarendon County, S.C., schools.

The Briggs "dictum" has been swept aside by several opinions, the decision said, and "these and other decisions compel a state in this circuit to take affirmative action to reorganize its school system by integrating the students, faculties, facilities and activities."

HEW guidelines recommend the rate of progress of desegregation for a school system making the change.

No specific racial proportions among pupils or faculties are required but there should be "significant progress" from year to year.

"The provision referring to percentages is a general rule of thumb or objective administrative guide for measuring progress in desegregation rather than a firm requirement that must be met," the court said.

"The percentage requirements in the guidelines are modest, suggesting only that systems using free choice plans for at least two years should expect 15 to 18 per cent of the pupil population to have selected desegregated schools," the court added.

Introduction

On May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court of the United States wrote, "We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal." This historic decision in the case of Brown et al. v. Board of Education of Topeka et al. involved cases coming from the states of Virginia, Delaware, Kansas, and South Carolina. The South Carolina case, Briggs et al. v. Elliott et al., came to the Supreme Court from Clarendon County School District No. 22. Today, twelve years after the 1954 Supreme Court decision, there are less than 50 Negro children attending desegregated schools in Clarendon County. The vast majority of Negro students there still attend segregated schools and the dual school system prevails. After twelve years County Superintendent of Education L. B. McCord continues to insist that integration is "theologically wrong" and he still feels that "you can't change people overnight."

During this 1966-1967 school year approximately 95% of South Carolina's Negro children are attending segregated schools. Only about 12 of the state's 108 school districts have made sufficient progress towards abolishing the dual school system so that the United States Office of Education can say that their performance is "satisfactory at this time." This does not mean that these districts have eliminated the dual school system, it merely indicates that they have demonstrated that they are making some reasonable progress towards achieving that goal.

During the past two years, the American Friends Service Committee and the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund have pooled their resources to sponsor the School Desegregation Task Force. Working in nine deep South states this group has informed citizens of their rights under school desegregation law, aided communities in organizing to effectuate greater desegregation, and has sent complaints to federal agencies when there were violations of school desegregation guidelines in local communities. This critique is based on the Task Force experience in South Carolina and the majority of the information was collected during seven months involvement in and observation of school desegregation efforts in South Carolina. Some of the information is based on newspaper accounts, reports from citizens, and other private but reliable reports.

The Guidelines

In early March, 1966, the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare published its "Revised Statement of Policies for School Desegregation Plans Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964." This publication was commonly referred to as the "guidelines." In subsequent months the guidelines became the foundation for political opportunism and vilification of officials of the United States Office of Education.

The guidelines were the regulations for school desegregation and were issued as required by Section 602, Title VI, of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Title VI of that act provided that: "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." The guidelines were first issued in 1965. Southern school districts were frequently successful in violating these guidelines because in an attempt to give the districts an opportunity to comply in good faith and establish their own administrative procedures for school desegregation, HEW made the guidelines vague. In order to correct this defect and to effectuate more substantial progress towards the abolition of the dual school system, the 1966 guidelines were more explicit and definitive in their requirements.

The 1966 guidelines required the following:

(1) To be eligible for federal funds, school systems with voluntary school desegregation plans had to submit an assurance (Form 441-B) that their plans would be carried out in accordance with the standards outlined in the guidelines.

(2) School systems had to make significant progress in eliminating the dual school system under free choice plans.

(3) The school system had to inform the community of its plan, solicit community support, and take the necessary steps to protect all persons exercising their rights under the plan.

(4) In school districts operating under a free choice plan, every student had to choose a school each year. There could only be one choice, and the school system had to ensure that the choice could be made without fear of reprisal.

(5) All school activities, facilities, and programs had to be desegregated.

(6) Schools had to make significant progress in desegregating their faculty and staff. HEW later explained that in a district, for example, with eight schools there should be at least eight full-time teachers involved in faculty desegregation.

(7) Small, inadequate schools established for Negro students or other minority groups had to be closed.

(8) School districts had to send out forms, letters of explanation, and publish newspaper notices giving students and parents information concerning the administration of freedom of choice plans.

The Office of Education had originally hoped to publish the guidelines in January, but they were not promulgated until March 7. This was because HEW took extra time to consult with Southern school officials before the new guidelines were issued, and because the guidelines were being carefully reviewed by HEW's legal counsel. The 1966 guidelines required that school districts operating under a freedom of choice plan should have a free choice transfer period beginning no earlier than March 1 and ending no later than April 30. Many school administrators were undoubtedly caught by surprise, and they generally felt that they had too little time to interpret the guidelines and follow their requirements. Ninety-eight of South Carolina's 108 school districts were operating under freedom of choice plans. Of the remainder, some districts were still in violation of the 1965 guidelines and had no authorized plan at all. Six of the state's largest districts were operating under federal court orders. Since many districts were concerned only with complying with the absolute minimum requirements of the guidelines, they felt that they were being pressured into a quick acceptance of the guidelines without being given time to study them adequately. However, some districts complained because they found 50 days inadequate time to plan for the traditional tactics of delay and circumvention when faced with the possibility of meaningful school desegregation.

By May 7, 1966, 105 of the 108 school districts in South Carolina had filed Form 441-B with the U.S. Office of Education. If a district did not submit Form 441-B, the commitment of federal funds for new activities was subject to deferral. The record of South Carolina school districts submitting Form 441-B was one of the best in the South.

South Carolina school administrators did follow those guideline regulations which called for letters, explanatory notices, and choice forms to be sent to all parents. In many cases these forms followed the exact form recommended by the Office of Education. There is no question but that the mere sending of these letters and forms resulted in an increased number of transfers from Negro to desegregated schools.

The Percentages

In order to have an administrative guide by which they could determine whether or not a school system was making satisfactory progress towards the abolition of the dual school system, the Office of Education established a system of percentages in the 1966 guidelines. These percentages were grossly misunderstood by the public and school officials.

The percentages were misinterpreted to mean "racial balance" or the percentage of Negroes attending schools with whites. Superintendent J. B. Kirkley of Marion District #3 (which had its funds deferred) said that the ratio of Negro to white students in the desegregated schools of his district exceeded that of many larger districts in the state (Columbia State, September 5, 1966). Bluffton District Superintendent H. E. McCracken said, "Twenty per cent of the students in our white schools are Negro...one of the highest percentages in the state. The federal government is using some sort of new math on us" (Charleston News & Courier, August 16, 1966).

Some school officials understood the percentages to mean the percentage of increase in the number of Negro students attending desegregated schools this year as compared to last year. Georgetown County Board County Chairman James C. Bourne said, "Well, we've doubled our Negro enrollment this year" (Charleston News & Courier, July 20, 1966). Mr. Bourne did not say that there would still be 98% of the Negro students in the county attending segregated schools. Similarly, Chester County Superintendent E. W. Nunnery expressed surprise that the performance of his school district had been judged unsatisfactory by the Office of Education even though the Negro enrollment in the county's all-white schools doubled that of last year (Columbia State, August 4, 1966). In Chester County in 1965 there were 89 Negroes attending desegregated schools, and there are 177 in 1966. This still leaves 96% of the Negro students in the county attending segregated schools. Superintendent Hugh T. Stoddard of Sumter School District #2 said, "We had more than 90 last year and we're expecting more than double that amount in the fall" (Charleston News & Courier, August 3, 1966). This year there are only 171 Negroes in desegregated schools in District #2 and there too most of the Negro students in the county are in segregated classes.

Unfortunately, many people of good will who were genuinely concerned about abolishing the dual school system, as well as some leaders in the Negro community, were caught up in this numbers game. They generally did not understand the reason for the percentages in the guidelines and frequently felt that if there were more Negro students in the desegregated schools this year than last year then things were moving along quite well and there was no reason to get disturbed. They did not stop to realize that if the present rate of desegregation continues it will be many, many years before the dual school system is abolished.

All of the above interpretations of the meaning of the percentages in the guidelines were incorrect. The percentage used as a guide by the Office of Education was the number of all of the Negro students in a district divided into the number of Negro students who were transfering to the desegregated schools. For instance, if there are 4,059 Negro students in Chester County schools and 175 transfer from the all-Negro schools to the desegregated schools this year, this means that about 4.1% of all the Negro pupils would be transfering. This does not demonstrate that Chester County is well on its way towards abolishing the dual school system (since about 96% of the Negro students in the district would still be in segregated schools), and therefore the Office of Education lists it as a "poor performer." The guidelines, in fact, do not mention anything about racial balance and they do not measure performance by the percentage of increase of Negro students in white schools over last year. The guideline percentages were either genuinely misunderstood or they were deliberately misinterpreted in order to confuse the public and put the Office of Education on the defensive. Secretary Gardner of HEW attempted to deal with the percentage issue in his letter of April 13 to school superintendents, but following that attempt, the Office of Education more or less abandoned efforts to interpret the purpose of the percentages. Those in opposition to the guidelines, however, continued to hit hard on the issue.

Informing the Community

In only a few school districts did officials attempt to encourage community support for the acceptance of their desegregation plan. This encouragement was required by section 181.17 of the guidelines. School men argued that the hostility of their communities would not permit them to take a progressive position on this issue. They cited the names of other superintendents in the state who had tried to lead their communities and who had been fired as a result. Many school officials had been lax in preparing the community for the inevitability of school desegregation and, as a result, they were caught between the hostility of the community and the requirements of the guidelines. School officials did not seek the cooperation of white and Negro citizens in making the freedom of choice system work in their communities.

Instances in which the public was adequately informed about the school desegregation plan by school officials and the local media were rare. In only a few cases did school superintendents call public meetings to fully explain the guidelines and the local desegregation plan to the citizens of the community. Such inadequate information to the public allowed for rumor and misunderstanding about the guidelines and about the intentions of the Office of Education. Some school officials attempted to keep their plans as quiet as possible so as not to arouse the indignation of the white community and not to indirectly stimulate a greater number of transfers by Negro students to the desegregated schools. Other school officials feared their own local press because of past experiences when the press had inaccurately reported their plans relating to other matters. School board meetings concerning the guidelines were frequently closed and local citizens had no opportunity to take part in deciding how the district would respond to the guidelines.

On April 2, 1966, the United States Commission on Civil Rights held a statewide conference on the guidelines in Columbia. Approximately six hundred persons attended the conference. This was one of the few opportunities for South Carolinians to receive a clear and direct explanation of the guidelines from federal officials representing HEW, the Office of Education, and the Justice Department. Following this meeting there was a meeting attended by Negro community leaders who met to discuss how communities should organize to promote school desegregation. This meeting was attended by about two hundred people and was a confederation of South Carolina civil rights, human relations, and education groups.

Throughout the summer those persons working to stimulate greater school desegregation found that the concerned white persons in the state generally were not aware of the magnitude of the problems, and it was difficult to organize a fearful Negro community. While the major civil rights groups in the state made some efforts to promote school desegregation, their energies were usually devoted to registering voters and other political matters so that any focus on school desegregation was of a low priority. There were only two people in the state who were working full-time on school desegregation for human relations groups. There were, of course, a number of individuals who worked on a volunteer basis in their own communities. Where there were a substantial number of transfers, the large number was due to the efforts of some individual or group in the community who worked to encourage school desegregation.

The Office of Education made little effort to speak directly to community leaders in an attempt to explain government actions. Many concerned individuals in South Carolina communities were totally unequipped to answer the criticisms of the guidelines and the Office of Education. Potential allies were lost because they had no information about what was going on except what their community leaders chose to tell them. In most cases they could only rely on the reports in the local conservative press and they had no idea as to how they could play a constructive role in encouraging their community to comply with the guidelines. The failure of the Office of Education to tell its story effectively to local people permitted those persons who wanted to obstruct its purpose to do so more effectively. Rumor, misinformation, and speculation thrived because the Office of Education failed to recognize the necessity of filling the information gap at the community level.

Termination of Federal Funds?

South Carolina school officials spent considerable time trying to determine whether or not the Office of Education was really serious about cutting off federal funds if a school district did not comply with the letter of the guidelines. Evidence that the Office of Education might be backing down came as early as April 8, 1966, when The State reported that it had learned from an Office of Education official that the guidelines would be enforced in a "democratic" way. Then in Secretary Gardner's April 13 letter he stated that the guidelines would be enforced with "considerable flexibility." The June 9 issue of The State reported that, "The word from Washington is that substantial faculty and student desegregation will be insisted upon or federal funds will be cut off." But then on June 11 The State ran an article with the headline, "U.S. May Not Hold Fast to Threat of Halting Funds to S.C. Schools."

For most of the summer there were reports that state officials were trying to get the guidelines "clarified." What they wanted clarified were the absolute minimum requirements of the guidelines. Though HEW and the U.S. Office of Education repeatedly told school officials that their funds would be terminated if they did not comply with the guidelines, the school men never really took them seriously.

The administrators were aware that the Office of Education was susceptible to political pressures and felt that the Office would eventually have to back down. Others felt that the U.S. Office was merely bluffing and would not really cut off funds. Still others had defied the guidelines last year and had not been denied federal funds, so they felt they could get away with it again in 1966. Interpretations of the Office of Education's position by state officials and newspaper pundits did little to clarify the issue. There were indications that the Office of Education would insist that some provisions of the guidelines be adhered to, but that some of the requirements were less important and would not have to be followed as closely.

The alleged lack of clarity in the guidelines and on the part of the Office of Education, fused with the desire of school officials to get off the hook, permitted school officials to say: "It's a little difficult to know exactly what they (Office of Education) want" (Charleston News & Courier, July 30, 1966); "We don't know what is coming from day to day" (Columbia State, August 19, 1966); "We don't know what they (Office of Education) will accept" (Columbia State, June 28, 1966); "Before we do anything we want to know on what grounds they (Office of Education) are deferring our payment" (Columbia State, September 5, 1966).

The Office of Education also did not make it clear to school superintendents, school boards, and the general public that the intent of Title VI and the guidelines was to abolish the dual school system. School officials felt that they were required only to achieve a kind of progressive tokenism. They did not realize that if freedom of choice did not adequately move the school system toward the abolition of the dual school system, the school district would have to adopt another plan or risk losing its federal funds. Most school districts, however, were aware that the termination of funds for a district is an absolute last resort for the Office of Education and that prior to that step every device is utilized in an effort to get the district to comply with the guidelines. Many districts were willing to gamble that the Office of Education was bluffing, that it would back down, or that it could just be worn down. Some districts, of course, decided that they would rather do without federal funds.

The Position of the "Establishment"

South Carolina school officials were reluctant to follow the literal requirements of the guidelines because they knew that state officials were working actively to get the Office of Education to back down on its commitment to the guidelines. One official high in the Office of Education has said, "In many ways we consider South Carolina more of a closed society than Mississippi." He went on to explain that at least in Mississippi and other states the Office of Education had received some cooperation from the officials in the State Department of Education and in the executive branch of the state government.

------The Governor

Governor Robert McNair played a strong role in supporting local school officials in their fight against the guidelines. Running for election for his first full term as governor this year, and facing opposition from Republican nominee Joseph Rogers, Governor McNair undoubtedly realized that he would have to take the lead in fighting the guidelines or otherwise risk being attacked by Rogers as a governor who would not stand up to the federal government. The Republican Party of South Carolina had called for a court test of the guidelines at the state GOP convention in March. Rogers was formerly a state representative from Clarendon County and had served as a loyal member of the South Carolina General Assembly's special committee to advise the state on legal methods of circumventing school desegregation. It was certain that Rogers would hit hard on the issues of federal involvement in local school affairs and the guidelines. Governor McNair, either because of conviction or because of political necessity, decided to become a leader in the fight against the guidelines.

At the National Governors' Conference in July, Governor McNair set up and presided over a meeting between Secretary John Gardner of HEW and the Southern governors. The meeting was for the purpose of seeking "clarification of the guidelines." It was also an opportunity for the Southern governors to express their feelings about the guidelines (Columbia State, July 7, 1966). On July 19, Governor McNair met with Assistant Commissioner of Education, David S. Seeley, and HEW Special Assistant for Civil Rights, Peter Libassi, to discuss "school desegregation compliance problems in South Carolina" (Columbia State, July 29, 1966). In late July, Governor McNair revealed that the state was giving some consideration to a court test of the guidelines and that state Attorney General Daniel R. McLeod was prepared to give legal assistance to any school district that wanted to take the guidelines issue to court (Charleston News & Courier, July 30, 1966). In August, Gov. McNair sent the state Attorney General to Washington to meet with officials in the U.S. Office of Education. According to press reports, the purpose of the meeting was to get "clarification as to how they (Office of Education) justify the requirements of the guidelines issued for school desegregation." (Columbia State, August 5, 1966).

It was later reported that Gov. McNair was going over the head of U.S. Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe II, and was dealing directly with staff members of Secretary Gardner's office (Charleston News & Courier, August 7, 1966). Shortly thereafter Gov. McNair announced that South Carolina would challenge the guidelines in court. The Governor took the opportunity to also say that he was taking this action partly for the reason of removing the guidelines issue from the political arena (Columbia State, August 13, 1966). In late August, GOP nominee for State Superintendent of Education, Dr. Inez C. Eddings, said that Gov. McNair had told a closed meeting of school administrators that "token" faculty integration and a 3% Negro transfer would satisfy federal officials this year. According to Dr. Eddings, the Governor told the administrators that the 1966 desegregation guidelines would not otherwise apply to South Carolina "since it has acted in good faith." The Governor was also reported to have said that he had received these assurances from HEW officials and "other top officials" (Charleston News & Courier, September 1, 1966).

At the Southern Governors' Conference, Gov. McNair presented a resolution which called for the governors to express "disapproval" of the guidelines, and also called for a congressional investigation of HEW (Columbia State, September 20, 1966). Gov. McNair's resolution was adopted in a milder form by the Southern Governors' Conference, and McNair later said that he was optimistic that Congress would initiate an investigation of the guidelines (Columbia State, September 23, 1966).

Also in September the South Carolina Education Association defended Gov. McNair after he had been attacked by Republican gubernatorial nominee Joseph O. Rogers for doing nothing to weaken the guidelines. The SCEA stated that "on numerous occasions during the past several months the governor has met with the South Carolina Association of School Superintendents, its executive committee, and other randomized groups of superintendents" to discuss the guidelines and problems related to school desegregation. The SCEA quoted Gov. McNair as saying that while South Carolina would comply with the law, the 1966 guidelines appeared to go beyond the law and the State was not asking any South Carolina district to go beyond the requirements of the law to fulfill the requirements of the guidelines. Gov. McNair was also reported to have told the superintendents that the protection and preservation of the educational program was more important than meeting some quota or percentage of desegregation required by the guidelines. Gov. McNair pointed out that boards of education and school superintendents had shown courage and restraint in dealing with the difficult problems, especially harassment and "wishy-washy" interpretations by federal officials (Columbia State, September 25, 1966). Though McNair had previously stated that a suit against the guidelines would be filed before the opening of school, it was not until mid-October that the state Attorney General filed suit in behalf of Lee County challenging the 1966 school desegregation guidelines (Columbia State, October 8, 1966).

------The Legislators

State officials were aided in their efforts to weaken the enforcement of the guidelines by members of the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate from South Carolina. These men were not only extremely vocal in their opposition to the guidelines and to the Office of Education's attempts to enforce them, but they constantly bombarded the Office of Education with letters of protest which set forth complaints on behalf of individual school districts. One official in the Office of Education has said that these letters were numerous, and since they had to be answered, it was difficult for the Office of Education to do its real work of enforcing compliance with the guidelines.

In April, Republican Senator Strom Thurmond said of the guidelines, "Oppression through arbitrary power is no longer just a threat, it is a reality" (Charlotte Observer, April 18, 1966). Thurmond also sent two telegrams to President Johnson and called the denial of federal funds to two South Carolina school districts "irresponsible, inequitable, and illegal" (Columbia State, June 29, 1966). In July five members of the House from South Carolina sent a letter to Commissioner Howe declaring that, "Good education is being sacrificed to arbitrary and vascillating interpretations of the law" (Columbia State, July 1, 1966). Thurmond's Republican colleague, Rep. Albert Watson, attacked the guidelines when they were first issued and even met with Commissioner Howe in an effort to have the guidelines rescinded (Columbia State, July 3, 1966).

One of the vehement attacks against the guidelines and Commissioner Howe came from Rep. L. Mendel Rivers. Rivers, a former Citizens Council member, had once said that the 1954 Supreme Court decision would bring "mongrelization of the Caucasian race" (Columbia State, November 29, 1955). He had also said that, "Regardless of the court decision, we will never see integration in South Carolina in our lifetime" (Charleston News & Courier, March 24, 1956). This year, in a speech on the House floor, Rep. Rivers called Commissioner Howe a "misfit" and said he was "ignorant." Rivers accused the Johnson administration of sending "commissars" into the South to demand recruitment of Negro teachers for integration purposes. He said the law had been "raped" and warned that, "We are really bitter and somebody is going to pay for it" (Columbia State, August 10, 1966). On September 30, 1966, Rivers said that Howe "talks like a Communist" and accused him of destroying the school system of America "lock, stock, and barrel." Rivers suggested also that the "best way to stop him (Howe) is to quit paying him" (Congressional Record, September 30, 1966).

Rep. W. J. Bryan Dorn felt that arbitrary decisions by the Office of Education were causing many veteran educators to retire earlier than they expected. The Greenwood legislator said that the rules from the Office of Education were coming from people "who know little if anything about real education" (Columbia State, August 10, 1966). Rep. Watson charged Commissioner Howe with attempting to "sabotage" local school systems. Watson called Howe a "czar" whose office was "rapidly growing into a totalitarian regime...bent upon the destruction of local control of education." Watson also asked for Howe's resignation and criticized Office of Education employees for being "heavy-handed" in their treatment of school officials (Columbia State, September 9, 1966). Shortly before the 89th Congress adjourned, New York Representative Emanuel Celler appointed a seven man subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee to determine whether or not the Office of Education had exceeded its legal authority in enforcing the guidelines. One of those appointed to the subcommittee was Rep. Robert T. Ashmore of South Carolina. Ashmore has said that he will "hold their (Office of Education) feet to the fire" when the hearings begin. Ashmore has promised that, "I will see that the South's viewpoint is represented" (Columbia State, October 4, 1966).

------The Educators

Soon after the guidelines appeared efforts were made to get some top state education officials to appear on a panel at the Civil Rights Commission conference. None of the individuals contacted were willing to serve on the panel, however. As early as April 12 it was reported that State Superintendent of Education, Dr. Jesse T. Anderson, would decline an invitation to meet with Harold Howe II, U.S. Commissioner of Education, to discuss the new guidelines. Dr. Anderson said that he had already discussed the guidelines with Howe and in the future he would just "read Howe's letters" (Columbia State, April 12, 1966). On June 7, 1966, the Columbia State reported that Dr. Anderson was promoting negotiations between two South Carolina school districts that did not sign 441-B and the Office of Education so that the districts would continue to receive funds. On June 11, 1966, the Columbia State reported that Dr. Anderson had told the State Board of Education that the government might not cut off funds to the two schools. In the same article it was also reported that a member of the Board from Lexington County District #1 (a non-complier in 1965) had said that his district had been just as well off without federal funds. In early July Dr. Anderson was in Washington, D.C. for an education meeting and took the opportunity to approach federal officials and ask that funds be restored to school districts not in compliance with Title VI (Columbia State, July 2, 1966).

When officials from the U.S. Office of Education came to Columbia in July, Dr. Anderson refused to allow them to utilize the facilities of the State Department of Education so they could discuss school desegregation plans with various school administrators from around the state. As a result, the Office of Education representatives had to meet in the Wade Hampton Hotel. Dr. Anderson refused to attend the meeting and insisted that no efforts had been made to arrange the meeting through the State Department of Education. It is now clear that attempts were made to work with the Department (Columbia State, July 12, 1966). In late July the State Department of Education in cooperation with the South Carolina Association of School Superintendents jointly sponsored a closed meeting to discuss school desegregation problems. This meeting was closed to the press and all visitors (Columbia State, July 29, 1966).

When a group from Florida State University held a conference in Columbia in August to help South Carolina school officials deal with administrative problems incident to school desegregation, they made an effort prior to the conference to clear it with the State Department of Education. Such clearance is important since most administrators in the state contact the State Department of Education when they are invited to a meeting and know little about its sponsors. In spite of the fact that the FSU people contacted the State Department of Education twice, they received no reply. As a result the conference was very poorly attended. In August, both the Republican and Democratic nominees for the office of State Superintendent of Education (Dr. Anderson is retiring at the end of this year) endorsed the South Carolina court suit against the 1966 guidelines (Charleston News & Courier, August 8, 1966).

In the spring of this year the National Education Association announced that it would be able to make a grant to Southern teachers' associations to hold a conference in each state. The conference would deal with faculty desegregation, and the condition of the grant was that the conference had to be sponsored by both of the teachers' associations, Negro and white. Such a conference would have undoubtedly contributed to progress in the area of faculty desegregation but at this time no such meeting has been held in South Carolina. It is reported that the South Carolina Education Association, the predominantly white teachers' association, was unwilling to co-sponsor such a conference with the Palmetto Education Association, the Negro teachers' association. Another opportunity for a positive contribution to education in South Carolina was apparently forfeited.

------The Newspapers

In both the Columbia State and the Charleston News & Courier throughout the summer there appeared editorial attacks on the guidelines, officials of the U.S. Office of Education, and the role of the federal government in education. On April 6, The News and Courier's lead editorial was entitled "Guidelines to Disaster." The editorial accused the federal government of seeming "determined to create new formulas of mixing." The lead editorial of the June 27 issue of The State called Commissioner Howe "the U.S. Commissar of Integration" and said that the guidelines could better be described as a "federal strait-jacket." A July 9 lead editorial in The State said that when Gov. McNair and the other Southern governors had met with Secretary Gardner at the National Governors' Conference all they got was "a lot of gobbledegook and guff from Harold Howe's henchmen." On July 24 another lead editorial in The State again referred to "Commissar Howe" and his "emissaries." The editorial said that "These guidelines not only go far beyond the requirements of the (1964 Civil Rights) law, they run counter to its very spirit in several particulars." The editorial observed that, "Commissar Howe has said that public schooling itself will not be tolerated unless the races are mixed in a manner acceptable--not to Congress or the Courts--but to the Howe hierarchy."

On July 19 The State's lead editorial was entitled "Tyranny in Education" and took the liberty of expanding on the National Republican Coordinating Committee's position paper dealing with the role of the federal government in education. The editorial suggested that the President should see to it that "his minions in the Office of Education" were advised of his statement that the tradition of local control of schools would not be forsaken. The News and Courier's lead editorial of July 30 intimated that the Office of Education would be disrupting the tranquility of South Carolina schools if it continued to insist on "forced integration of faculties as well as student bodies." The August 16 lead editorial of The News and Courier said that, "Mr. Howe and those who share his educational views also have no legitimate place in government." The editorial also observed that, "The American way of life is supposed to be a free way of life, not a social laboratory for off-beat experiments in human relations." On September 6 The News and Courier's lead editorial referred to Commissioner Howe as "a zealot for integration" who could be removed only by getting rid of "the administration that allows him to pressure the people with the people's own money." These editorial opinions from the state's two largest newspapers are representative of similar opinions expressed in the editorials of other state newspapers.

This examination, then, of the position of state educational, political, and newspaper leaders toward the 1966 school desegregation guidelines reveals a posture of defiance, misinterpretation, and an almost total lack of cooperation with those seeking to abolish the dual school system in the South. Intemperate language was the order of the day, and repeated condemnation of the guidelines and inferences concerning the legality of the guidelines contributed significantly to the public lack of confidence in the Office of Education and its administration of the guidelines. For Negroes, the posture of the state's "Establishment" did little to reassure them that they could attend desegregated schools without fear of confronting hostility and possible danger. As the summer wore on it became obvious that the state's posture would significantly contribute to the failure of freedom of choice to abolish the dual school system in South Carolina. Every public statement, no matter how much it was couched in terms of legal questions, seemed to point to the fact that South Carolina school administrators and the state's leaders did not want to have more than a token number of Negroes in the schools with whites.

The Burdens of Freedom of Choice

During the freedom of choice period itself it was clear that the choice was not as free as the guidelines intended. The guidelines specifically stated in section 181.49 that no student could be denied his choice for any reason other than overcrowding. In Orangeburg County District #2 the chairman of the school board of trustees told one Negro parent that her child's application to attend the desegregated school had been rejected because the board did not feel that his grades were high enough to demonstrate that he could perform satisfactorily in the desegregated school. Also in Orangeburg #2 some Negro students who chose to attend the desegregated school were rejected but were not told why their applications for transfer were refused. This was in violation of the guidelines.

In Williamsburg County a Negro family was threatened that they would have to move off the land of the owner if their child did not change his choice from the desegregated school. In Dorchester County District #2 Negro parents from a rural area near Summerville were told by the superintendent that the "guidelines do not apply to rural areas" and that their children could not be picked up by the school buses going to the desegregated schools because it would not be feasible to reroute the buses. Approximately 79 of these children who had chosen to go to the desegregated schools in the district were refused transfer in spite of the fact that the guidelines did apply to all areas in a school district, urban and rural; and subsequent investigations showed that school buses take white children from the same general area as where these Negro children live to the desegregated schools where the Negro children were denied entrance. In Dorchester #3 approximately 200 Negro children chose to attend the desegregated schools but all of these were rejected for overcrowding. Only the 30 Negro children who attended the desegregated schools in Dorchester #3 last year were allowed to return. The children who were rejected were notified only three days in advance of the 1966-1967 school term that they would not be allowed to attend the desegregated school. Parents from the area reported that the desegregated schools are not at all overcrowded. Now both District #2 and #3 face the possibility of losing their federal funds. Reports from Barnwell District #19 indicated that some Negro parents have been told that they would have to either move or take their children out of the desegregated schools.

In many counties throughout the state Negro parents were reluctant to send their children to the desegregated schools because of a fear that they would suffer physical harassment, social isolation from their classmates, and academic failure. Other parents were reluctant to transfer their children for fear that the parents would lose their jobs. In most school districts, officials made no effort to communicate with the Negro community in an attempt to alleviate these fears. Where such contact was made it was often relayed through the traditional middle-class Negro leadership which has little effective contact with the grass-roots members of the community.

One superintendent said: "We operate on a freedom of choice basis. We haven't done anything for or against them coming. We feel that is the best method." This was typical of school officials who were reluctant to take any action which might infer that they were trying to aid the transfer of Negro students to desegregated schools. As a result, Negro parents and students found little reason to believe that they would not undergo considerable hardship if they transferred to the desegregated school. Assurances of concern, protection, and respect for their rights as citizens and human beings were generally not forthcoming from school officials. Without some personal expression of these concerns from school officials and leaders in the white community, there was no reason for most Negroes to believe that their experience in the school would differ greatly from the years of physical and spiritual intimidation they had known in the past.

A Choice May Not Be Changed

Most school districts in South Carolina closed their free choice periods by May 30. Some districts, however, kept their choice periods open throughout the summer for Negro students who decided to attend the desegregated schools. Shortly after the closing of the formal choice period, school districts were required to submit to the Office of Education an estimate of the number of children in their district who would be attending schools across racial lines for the first time this year. Then, shortly after school opened, districts were required to send in another report giving the actual number of children attending schools across racial lines.

A comparison of the two figures for 86 of the 98 school districts operating under freedom of choice indicates that 32 of the districts had an increase over the number of students estimated in the first report. In other words, Richland County School District #1 estimated (based on the return of choice forms) that they would have 1,184 Negro students enrolled in desegregated schools, but the actual figure after school opened was 1,240. In 54 school districts, however, the number of students attending schools across racial lines for the first time was less than the original estimate. For example, in Charleston District #9 the original estimate was 142 but after school opened only 31 Negro students were reported to be attending desegregated schools. In Chesterfield #3 the number dropped from 5 to 0; in Hampton #2 from 83 to 55; in Orangeburg #3 from 58 to 35; and in Union from 304 to 90.

Certainly in some of the districts where the number dropped it was because the parents of children moved out of the district between the time of the choice period and the time school opened. On the other hand, in those districts where there was a significant decrease, it was because Negro students changed their minds and decided to return to the Negro school rather than to stick with their original choice of attending the desegregated school. This was a direct violation of the guidelines.

Section 181.48 of the guidelines states that once a student has made his choice it could not be changed for any reason except (1) In case of change of residence (2) In case of compelling hardship (3) In case a student required a course of study not offered at that school. In many cases, however, students were permitted to transfer back to the Negro school without meeting any of these conditions. Such cases even occurred after school opened.

In McCormick County, for example, Negro children were permitted to transfer back to Mims High School (Negro) from McCormick High School (desegregated) several days after school had begun. There was no effort made on the part of school officials to keep the children at McCormick High and there were no administrative procedures to be followed in changing schools. The Negro children merely quit going to McCormick High one day and began going to Mims High the next. It is also reported that in Spartanburg District #3, Lee County, and Beaufort County there were similar incidents of transfer after the beginning of school. This was a general pattern across the state.

In Laurens County District #56 seven Negro children were returned to the Negro school by school authorities after they had failed a test at the desegregated school. These children were told that they were not academically prepared to attend the desegregated school. While the students were judged not to be academically fit for the desegregated school they were returned to the same grade at the Negro school as the one they had been in at the desegregated school. Such actions only perpetuate the idea that the Negro school is an inferior educational institution and that its products are "unready" to compete with whites.

Harassment of Students

There has been some harassment of Negro students in desegregated schools since the beginning of the 1966-1967 school session. In Dorchester District #1 a child threw a baseball at a Negro student, a Negro girl was hit by a white girl in the restroom, and white students threw rocks and other missiles at the Negro students. Students are segregated in the classrooms and on the school buses. Students report that white teachers ignore the Negro students in class and make no effort to involve them in class discussions. There are also charges of unfair judication by school administrators of disputes between Negro and white children.

In McCormick County Negro students attending the desegregated high school were called names, hit with paper and pennies, and did not feel that the academic environment was such that they could study properly. In Beaufort County a Negro girl was hit with a piece of glass and had to have five stitches taken in her face. There were also incidents of fights in the school yard involving Negro and white children and there has been harassment of Negro children on school buses. Local parents do not feel that discipline problems in which Negro and white students have been involved have been disposed of in a fair manner. In Colleton County there were reports that Negro children were forced to sit in the rear of the school buses and that they were harassed on the school buses. In Lee County one Negro student in a desegregated school had his house shot into. In Kershaw County there was some fighting on the school buses so seats have now been assigned to Negro and white students to keep them apart.

In general, however, there was relatively little harassment of Negro students by their white schoolmates. Many Negro students report that they are doing well and are enjoying and benefiting from their experience in the desegregated schools. There is name calling in most every school but this has subsided as the school year has progressed. Discipline on school buses is a general problem and this is undoubtedly due to the fact that in South Carolina there are student drivers. The ability of these students to maintain discipline on their buses and drive their buses at the same time is strained. Too, the drivers are frequently driving their own classmates and are probably reluctant to reprimand them or report them to school officials for discipline problems. It should also be remembered that these student drivers are subject to the same prejudices as their parents and classmates.

Routing of School Buses

South Carolina school districts have refused to follow the 1966 guideline requirements for eliminating segregation of school bus routes. The guidelines said that "Routing and scheduling of transportation must be planned on the basis of such factors as economy and efficiency, and may not operate to impede desegregation. Routes and schedules must be changed to the extent necessary to comply with this provision." In most districts the school buses were desegregated only for those students attending the desegregated schools. In other words, buses carrying white students going to the predominantly white school usually pick up Negro children who have transferred and are now attending the predominantly white school.

Buses have not been rerouted so that white and Negro students ride on the same buses if they live close to each other. Buses have not been rerouted so that a school bus, for instance, will pick up a Negro student and a white student who might live on the same road less than 200 yards from each other, and then take them to the town where the children are dropped at their respective schools. White student drivers drive buses loaded with white children and Negro student drivers drive buses loaded with Negro children. A bus with white children may follow a bus with Negro children for a considerable distance on the same road, each bus picking up students of each race separately, and then take them to two schools in close proximity to one another.

Desegregation of School Activities

Many schools have begun to desegregate their activities and Negro students are beginning to participate in school sports, glee clubs, and other activities at formerly all-white schools. There are schools, however, where no Negroes are participating in such activities, either because they are barred from doing so or because no Negroes have yet taken the initiative to join such activities.

The segregation of high school athletic conferences contributes to the preservation of the dual school system. A predominantly white school will not play a Negro school of the same size located in the same town. In one South Carolina town the Negro football team must play all of its night games out of town because its field has no lights, no seats, and no yardline markers--in fact, it only has two goal posts. The white school in the same town has good football facilities but they are not made available to the Negro team. While newspapers throughout the state publish the rankings of white teams in various athletic conferences, Negro high school rankings are unlisted. In many Negro schools the PTA must raise money for team uniforms, field lights, or other equipment for athletics.

At many desegrated schools, Negro students are not eligible for class awards given by the United Daughters of the Confederacy, and other fraternal and civic organizations. The academic honor societies do not hold their state-wide conferences on an integrated basis and the same is true of some other state conferences of high school organizations which exist in both Negro and white schools.

Throughout the state the Negro students are excluded from social affairs which are routinely part of the schools' activities. Such activities as junior-senior proms, beach trips, and other similar affairs have come to be privately sponsored in those school districts where the schools are desegregated to the degree that Negro students might be involved if the activities were school-sponsored. This practice is one of the most pernicious forms of discrimination which serves only to isolate the Negro students from any meaningful social activity with their fellow students.

In some districts the PTA is open to all parents, Negro and white, while in others it is closed. In some of the bi-racial PTAs the organization is structured so that it is virtually impossible for Negro parents to be elected to leadership positions. Even where the PTAs are desegregated, there are reports that the Negro parents have little voice or representation.

Faculty Desegregation

South Carolina's greatest failure in the area of school desegregation is the low number of full-time teachers who are in schools of the opposite race for the first time this year. Only a very few schools in the state have any significant number of teachers involved in teaching full-time across racial lines. Most of these teachers are not involved in the traditional academic subjects of the sciences, languages, social sciences, and mathematics. Instead, they are teaching such courses as agriculture, band, carpentry, vocational education, driver education, library science, physical education, and home economics. It is estimated that less than 24% of the state's school districts have any full-time faculty desegregation. Sixty percent of the districts have some type of part-time faculty or staff desegregation, but even it is apt to be negligible. Those persons participating in part-time faculty desegregation are often involved in speech therapy, remedial reading, or work with retarded children. These people usually serve both the Negro and white schools and frequently work out of the central administrative office of the district.

School officials feared faculty desegregation even more than student desegregation. Many of these administrators felt that many Negro teachers had attended inferior public schools and colleges and had then been hired to teach in a similar situation where they were given few opportunities for professional advancement or training. These administrators found themselves in the dilemma of saying that the Negro teachers were adequate for the Negro school but were somehow inadequately prepared to teach white children. Moreover, these school men were reluctant to restructure their traditional methods of class organization (as team teaching would necessitate) so that faculty desegregation would proceed more smoothly and would be more palatable to the community.

Administrators missed out on an opportunity to acclimate their communities and faculty to teacher desegregation when they refused to follow the suggestions offered in the 1965 guidelines. Those guidelines did not call for any specific faculty desegregation but did suggest that school administrators begin some part-time faculty desegregation and to also begin to hold teachers meetings together. Most school districts chose not to follow these suggestions, thinking that the guidelines would not be enforced. Indeed, there were no penalties for those districts which did not choose to follow the suggestions. This year, however, when confronted with specific teacher desegregation requirements, schools were unprepared and, in fact, are doing for the first time this year what was recommended for last year. Some school districts are still not holding joint teachers' meetings and some have no desegregation of faculty, either part time or full time. Negro parents and children have said that they believe that more Negro students would choose to attend the desegregated schools if there were Negro teachers there who were teaching traditional academic subjects.

Superintendents certainly faced many problems when considering how they should desegregate their faculties. Though some superintendents said that they could not find Negro teachers who were willing to teach in the desegregated schools, subsequent investigations showed that there were Negro teachers in those communities who were willing and able. It has also been reported that some superintendents instructed their Negro principals to try to find white teachers to transfer to the Negro schools. Given the fact that the social mores of the South do not look favorably on a Negro male approaching a white female in a professional capacity, it is not surprising that such attempts were usually futile. Many superintendents said that they were giving their teachers a "freedom of choice" and they could teach wherever they wished to do so. These administrators likewise said that they had traditionally assigned teachers on this basis and that if they told a white teacher to go to a Negro school the teacher would quit. This might have happened but few school officials tried it to find out. Instead, they insisted that they were already facing a critical teacher shortage and that it was impossible to assign teachers. In most areas of school desegregation, it was found that school superintendents did exactly what they wanted to. If they wanted to make progress they generally did so, but if they didn't want to follow the guidelines, they used some rationalization for not doing so.

There is a fear that in the future teaching may prove to be a dead end profession for Negroes. As more and more schools are desegregated and as more Negro teachers are in desegregated schools there is some question as to whether these teachers will have the opportunities of professional advancement available to their white colleagues. If this is the case there may be less and less Negro students who decide to go into teaching as a career. Similarly, there is a feeling among many professional Negro educators that when the two teacher associations merge, the white group will merely absorb the Negro group rather than genuinely merge with it. They point to such recent cases as the "mergers" in Florida and Virginia. In each of these cases the Negro associations have apparently been taken into the white groups with little representation given to the Negroes, and thus their professional interests are at the mercy of the whites. Such concerns are presently some of the factors for delaying the merger of the two associations in South Carolina.

In no district in the state did school officials seek to utilize resources available under Title IV of the 1964 Civil Rights Act to cope with problems incident to school desegregation. Title IV provides resources which can take the form of technical assistance, grants to school boards, and training institutes for teachers and administrators going into newly integrated situations. Funds are available for financing these programs and these resources have been successfully utilized in other Southern states to help teachers and administrators deal with desegregation problems. No school system, school board, or college in South Carolina has yet held a program in the state that has been funded by Title IV. Officials in the Office of Education are eager for some sort of Title IV program to begin in the state and they have practically said that they will fund any worthwhile program which is submitted from South Carolina. This opportunity to deal constructively with school desegregation problems in the state has been bypassed by South Carolina educational leaders.

Small, Inadequate Schools

The 1966 guidelines required that small inadequate schools maintained for the exclusive use of one race be closed. There are few of these schools in South Carolina because since the 1950s the state has consolidated schools and built new school plants for Negro students. There are no unaccredited high schools in South Carolina, but parents continue to report inadequate facilities in Negro schools. The accreditation of elementary schools is entirely voluntary and of the almost 1000 elementary schools in the state only about 143 were accredited last year.

In Dorchester County District #3 there is Four Holes School which is maintained for the exclusive use of an ethnic group of Indian background. This year Four Holes School offers eight grades but has only 56 students and three teachers. It is reported that students from this school attempted to transfer to the desegregated school but were rejected. At first they refused to attend their old school, but eventually they did return after the superintendent promised to get their birth certificates changed to "white" and to add two rooms to Four Holes School. Also, in Charleston County District #23 the Edisto Island Elementary School has only 42 students and two teachers though it allegedly has seven grades. This school is maintained for the exclusive use of white children. There are about 20 other elementary schools in the state with less than 100 children in each one.

In other districts in the state small inadequate schools were closed this year. The students at these schools were given a free choice as to where they wanted to go to school in the future, and the Negro children involved went either to an all-Negro school or to a desegregated school.

ESEA: Equality of Segregation?

There is evidence that programs funded by Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act are playing a major role in retarding school desegregation.

The ESEA provides for the availability of federal funds to school districts based on the number of school-age children in the district from low income families. The money is granted to the state, and the state, in turn, is responsible for approving programs submitted from local school districts. South Carolina is eligible to receive about twenty-two million dollars under the program. Much of this money is being used for underprivileged children in Negro schools, since that is where most such children are located.

In South Carolina the projects funded with ESEA money are to provide free lunches, free textbooks, remedial reading teachers, clothing, eyeglasses, medical and dental care, social workers, mobile classrooms, etc. For Negro children and parents who live on a low income, these services are meeting a real need. If, however, a child can receive these services only by attending the Negro school he is likely to stay there and chances of meaningful desegregation in the district are slight. It is not necessary that the programs be restricted to those schools with the highest concentration of children from low income families. Commissioner Howe sent a letter this summer to the state departments of education notifying them that when utilizing ESEA funds, it was possible to devise programs to benefit the child, regardless of where he attended school. This has not been done to any great degree in South Carolina and therefore these programs tend to be available to many Negro children only if they stay at the Negro school. One South Carolina school superintendent has admitted that the ESEA encourages segregation because some Negro families would rather have their children remain in a poor school that qualifies for the ESEA funded programs.

In some school districts which had their federal funds deferred, school officials attempted to blame the federal government for the deferral and piously expressed their concern for those who would no longer benefit from the funds. Superintendent Kirkley of Marion #3 said, "Our night adult education classes will be what will hit us hardest. We'll have to cut that out." Mr. Kirkley went on to explain that there were 100 adults in the classes, all Negro. In Dillon #1 where less than 1% of the 1,246 Negroes in the district transferred to desegregated schools, the district's funds were deferred. The district had provided 425 free lunches in 1965-1966 but after the funds were deferred the superintendent suddenly found that there were 1,200 children who needed to be fed. The Chester Board of School Trustees wrote the U.S. Office of Education that, "The educational welfare of our culturally deprived Negro boys and girls would be adversely affected by the withdrawal of federal funds and that in such an event it would be our responsibility to take an action to court in an effort to protest the rights of these children." In Chesterfield #4 the superintendent warned Negro citizens that if they continued to send letters of complaint to Washington the district's funds would be in danger of being cut off and the Negroes would be ones who would be hurt by this. This threat influenced many people in the Negro community.

While all adult education programs in the state are supposedly integrated, many communities have found ways around this. The most common ploy is to hold adult education classes at both the white and Negro schools in the community. In such situations, the Negroes usually attend the classes at the Negro school and the white adults go to the classes at the predominantly white school.

Deferral of Federal Funds

Much of the current controversy surrounding the U.S. Office of Education hinges on the question of whether or not the Office has the authority to defer a school district's funds without first having a hearing to determine whether or not the district is violating Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Regardless of the legality of the action, however, there is little evidence to suggest that withholding federal funds is an effective sanction to encourage abolition of the dual school system in most South Carolina school districts. An article in the September 27, 1966, issue of The State indicated that federal deferral of funds for new programs would affect only about nine of the state's 108 school districts because the State Department of Education worked hard to allocate funds before the deferral notices were issued. State Department of Education officials stated that they were "not working against Washington, but working for our own people" in seeking to see that the districts got their money before the deferral notices were published. Because of early planning and preparation the State Department of Education was able to approve ESEA Title I projects amounting to more than $16 million out of a tentative allocation of $22 million.

The Chairman of the Marlboro County Board of Education (which did not submit a 441-B) said, "We did not use federal money in our budget last year nor will we this year." He then pointed out that the district was carrying on the same programs now as when it had used federal funds. The superintendent of Marion #3 said, "We're not hurting...We can raise taxes, put on 10 mills, and make it up...We can curtail our operation a little bit and get along fine." It is true, however, that some districts have gone along with the guidelines because they feared losing their federal money. It seems that many school districts consider their relations with the federal government to be a game in which they see how little they can do under the guidelines and still receive federal funds. In those districts where federal funds are lost, there is little desire to move towards the abolition of the dual school system. The district may be brought into court but court decisions on school desegregation requirements in South Carolina are less stringent than the guidelines, and less apt to be updated and revised.

Desegregation in Court Order Districts

South Carolina has six school districts which are operating under federal court order, and these cases were initiated by Negro parents. These court orders were first handed down in 1964 and the required administrative procedures to effect school desegregation were considerably more lenient than more recent court decisions and the 1966 guidelines. This summer the plaintiffs in these cases went back into court to get the decisions revised. The school districts involved were Greenville County, Orangeburg #5, Sumter #2, Clarendon #1, Charleston #20 and Darlington County. The cases were argued in federal court on June 27 but it was not until August 27 that a three judge federal court gave its decision that the 1964 orders would be revised. The school districts involved were required to present new plans for the court to approve. The effect of the litigation was that the requirements of the court would not be effectuated until the 1967-1968 school year. Because the Office of Education has no authority over court order school districts, any degree of school desegregation in the six districts for the 1966-1967 school year is acceptable, and the question of performance, which is the major criterion for compliance in those districts operating under the guidelines, is of little concern to those under court order. As long as a court order district in South Carolina complies with the requirements of the court, they can desegregate at a minimal rate. In court order school districts, the burden of desegregating the schools and abolishing the dual school system is totally in the hands of the Negro community unless the school officials feel a responsibility and commitment to assume this burden. The latter is not the case in South Carolina.

There are several South Carolina school districts which are operating under court orders, but who were taken into court by the U.S. Department of Justice rather than by private citizens. These cases involved Lexington #1, Calhoun #2, and Clarendon #2. As provided for in Title IV of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Negro parents asked the Justice Department to file suit on their behalf since they were financially unable to initiate the litigation. In each of the cases, the federal judge required the districts to submit free choice plans to the court. The Office of Education also has no jurisdiction over these districts.

Conclusion

Based on our experience in the field of school desegregation, we feel that South Carolina's lack of progress in this area is attributable to the following factors:

(1) Local school officials and state political and educational leaders have resisted change in the area of school desegregation.

(2) The majority of the white community has also resisted change and has, at times, been openly hostile to any policies which would tend to bring about greater desegregation. When school officials have taken positive steps to produce change, they have not been supported by the white community.

(3) Because of the hostility of the white community and the resistance on the part of local school officials, political, and educational leaders, the Negro community has been beset by fear and cynicism. As a result, it has been difficult to organize the Negro community for meaningful desegregation and difficult to overcome the inertia created by past years of oppression.

(4) Federal agencies have failed to provide strong leadership and effective enforcement of school desegregation regulations.

One would hope that in the years to come, when there is perhaps less political ferment in the state, school desegregation will be approached with more reason and equanimity. There is no question that genuine progress can be made in this area, but it demands leaders who are willing to recognize opportunities for progress and who do not feel obligated to defy the federal government with such enthusiasm.

Educators, to be sure, are being called upon to face the challenges of equality of educational opportunity with imagination and courage. Unfortunately, it appears that many professional educators are finding it difficult to adjust to the increased involvement of the federal government in education, and too few of them recognize that the goal of Title VI is to abolish the dual school system. South Carolina will not make genuine progress in education until our citizens recognize that integrated schools and quality education are not mutually exclusive.

REVISED STATEMENT OF POLICIES FOR SCHOOL DESEGREGATION PLANS UNDER TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

December 1966

As Amended for the School Year 1967–68

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
Office of Education

Revised Statement of Policies for School Desegregation Plans Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964

(As Amended for the School Year 1967–68)

Subpart A—Applicability of This Statement of Policies

§ 181.1 Title VI and the HEW Regulation

Section 601 of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 provides that:

> No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

As required by Section 602 of Title VI, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has issued a Regulation to assure the elimination of discrimination in Federal aid programs it administers. The HEW Regulation was published as Part 80 of Title 45, Code of Federal Regulations (45 CFR Part 80).

§ 181.2 Compliance by School Systems Eliminating Dual School Structure

To be eligible for Federal aid, a school system must act to eliminate any practices in violation of Title VI, including the continued maintenance of a dual structure of separate schools for students of different races. The HEW Regulation recognizes two methods of meeting this requirement: (1) a desegregation order of a Federal court; or (2) a voluntary desegregation plan.

§ 181.3 Purpose of This Statement of Policies

This Statement of Policies applies to public elementary and secondary school systems undergoing desegregation to eliminate a dual school structure. It sets forth the requirements which voluntary desegregation plans must meet for the Commissioner to determine under the HEW Regulation that a plan is adequate to accomplish the purposes of Title VI. This Statement supersedes the "General Statement of Policies Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 Respecting Desegregation of Elementary and Secondary Schools," issued in April 1965 and published as 45 CFR Part 181, and has been amended further to make it applicable to the school year 1967–68.

§ 181.4 Initial Demonstration of Compliance

To be eligible for Federal aid, a school system must first assure the Commissioner that it will comply with Title VI and the HEW Regulation. It must submit the form of assurance that meets its circumstances, under §§ 181.5, 181.6, or 181.7 below.

§ 181.5 Systems Without Dual School Structure

(a) Submission of Form 441. A school system which does not maintain any characteristic of a dual school structure may initially demonstrate compliance by submitting HEW Form 441. This is an assurance of full and immediate compliance with Title VI.

(b) Resubmission Not Required. A school system which has appropriately submitted HEW Form 441 need not submit a new copy with subsequent requests for Federal aid, but need only affirm when requested that the assurance submitted continues in effect.

(c) Supplementation of Assurance. The Commissioner may require supplementation of HEW Form 441 when he has reasonable cause to believe that there is a failure to comply with any provision of Title VI or the HEW Regulation.

§ 181.6 Systems Under Federal Court Order for Desegregation

(a) Submission of Order. A school system under a Federal court desegregation order which meets the requirements of the HEW Regulation may submit, as evidence of compliance with Title VI, a copy of the court order, together with an assurance that it will comply with the order, including any future modification.

(b) Resubmission Not Required. A school system under a court order accepted by the Commissioner need not submit another copy, but must submit any modification not previously submitted.

(c) Revision of Court Orders. A school system under a court order for desegregation which is not in accord with current judicial standards is subject to legal action by the Department of Justice, or by the parties to the original suit, to modify the order to meet current standards.

§ 181.7 Systems With Voluntary Desegregation Plans

(a) Submission of Form 441–B. A school system with a voluntary desegregation plan must provide an assurance that it will abide by the applicable requirements for such plans contained in this Statement of Policies. Such assurance may be given by submitting HEW Form 441–B to the Commissioner. Commitments of funds for new activities are subject to deferral, as provided by law, for school systems with voluntary desegregation plans which have failed to submit HEW Form 441–B.

(b) Resubmission Not Required. A school system which has appropriately submitted HEW Form 441–B need not submit a new copy with subsequent requests for Federal aid, but need only affirm when requested that the assurance submitted continues in effect.

(c) Changing Type of Plan. A school system may change from one type of desegregation plan to another if such action would eliminate segregation and all other forms of discrimination more expeditiously. A school system planning to change the type of its plan must submit a new plan meeting the requirements of this Statement of Policies, together with HEW Form 441–B, for a determination by the Commissioner as to the adequacy of the plan to accomplish the purposes of Title VI.

(d) Retaining Present Type of Plan. A school system with a desegregation plan accepted by the Commissioner need not resubmit its plan if it intends to continue under the same type of plan. If a plan accepted by the Commissioner fails to meet any requirement under this Statement of Policies, the submission of HEW Form 441–B will be deemed to amend the plan so that it will meet such requirement. Amendments to the plan are not to be submitted unless requested. However, certain supporting materials must be submitted, as provided in Subparts B, C, and D below.

(e) Initial Submittal of Plans. If no desegregation plan has been submitted or accepted for a school system, HEW Form 441–B and a plan meeting the requirements of this Statement of Policies must be submitted.

[§§ 181.8 through 181.10 reserved]

Subpart B—Basic Requirements for All Voluntary Desegregation Plans

§ 181.11 Various Types of Desegregation Plans

It is the responsibility of a school system to adopt and implement a desegregation plan which will eliminate the dual school system and all other forms of discrimination as expeditiously as possible. No single type of plan is appropriate for all school systems. In some cases, the most expeditious means of desegregation is to close the schools originally established for students of one race, particularly where they are small and inadequate, and to assign all the students and teachers to desegregated schools. Another appropriate method is to reorganize the grade structure of schools originally established for students of different races so that these schools are fully utilized, on a desegregated basis, although each school contains fewer grades. In some cases desegregation is accomplished by the establishment of non-racial attendance zones. Under certain conditions, a plan based on free choice of schools may be a way to undertake desegregation. In certain cases the purposes of Title VI may be most expeditiously accomplished by a plan applying two or more of the foregoing procedures to certain schools or different grade levels. Based on consideration of all the circumstances of a particular school system, the Commissioner may determine that its desegregation plan is not adequate to accomplish the purposes of Title VI, in which case he may require the adoption of an alternative plan. In any case where the State education agency is pursuing policies and programs for expediting the elimination of the dual school structure, the Commissioner will consider this factor in determining whether a particular type of plan is adequate for any given school system in such State.

§ 181.12 Student Assignment Practices

Title VI precludes a school system from any action or inaction designed to perpetuate or promote segregation or any other form of discrimination, or to limit desegregation or maintain what is essentially a dual school structure. Any educational opportunity offered by a school system must be available to students without regard to race, color, or national origin. In particular, any academic tests or other procedures used in assigning students to schools, grades, classrooms, sections, courses of study or for any other purpose must be applied uniformly to all students without regard to race, color, or national origin. Curriculum, credit and promotion procedures must not be applied in such a way as to penalize or hamper students who transfer from one school to another pursuant to a desegregation plan.

§ 181.13 Faculty and Staff

(a) Desegregation of Staff. The racial composition of the professional staff of a school system, and of the schools in the system, must be considered in determining whether students are subjected to discrimination in educational programs. Each school system is responsible for correcting the effects of all past discriminatory practices in the assignment of teachers and other professional staff.

(b) New Assignments. Race, color, or national origin may not be a factor in the hiring or assignment to schools or within schools of teachers and other professional staff, including student teachers and staff serving two or more schools, except to correct the effects of past discriminatory assignments.

(c) Dismissals. Teachers and other professional staff may not be dismissed, demoted, or passed over for retention, promotion, or rehiring, on the ground of race, color, or national origin. In any instance where one or more teachers or other professional staff members are to be displaced as a result of desegregation, no staff vacancy in the school system may be filled through recruitment from outside the system unless the school officials can show that no such displaced staff member is qualified to fill the vacancy. If as a result of desegregation, there is to be a reduction in the total professional staff of the school system, the qualifications of all staff members in the system must be evaluated in selecting the staff members to be released.

(d) Past Assignments. The pattern of assignment of teachers and other professional staff among the various schools of a system may not be such that schools are identifiable as intended for students of a particular race, color, or national origin, or such that teachers or other professional staff of a particular race are concentrated in those schools where all, or the majority, of the students are of that race. Each school system has a positive duty to make staff assignments and reassignments necessary to eliminate past discriminatory assignment patterns. Staff desegregation for the 1967–68 school year must include significant progress beyond what was accomplished for the 1966–67 school year in the desegregation of teachers assigned to schools on a regular full-time basis. Patterns of staff assignment to initiate staff desegregation might include, for example: (1) Some desegregation of professional staff in each school in the system, (2) the assignment of a significant portion of the professional staff of each race to particular schools in the system where their race is a minority and where special staff training programs are established to help with the process of staff desegregation, (3) the assignment of a significant portion of the staff on a desegregated basis to those schools in which the student body is desegregated, (4) the reassignment of the staff of schools being closed to other schools in the system where their race is a minority, or (5) an alternative pattern of assignment which will make comparable progress in bringing about staff desegregation successfully.

§ 181.14 Services, Facilities, Activities, and Programs

(a) General. Each school system is responsible for removing any segregation and any other form of discrimination affecting students in connection with all services, facilities, activities and programs (including transportation, athletics, and other extra-curricular activities) that may be conducted or sponsored by or affiliated with the schools of the system.

(b) Specific Situations.

(1) A student attending school for the first time on a desegregated basis may not be subject to any disqualification or waiting period for participation in activities and programs, including athletics, which might otherwise apply because he is a transfer student.

(2) If transportation services are furnished, sponsored or utilized by a school system, dual or segregated transportation systems and any other form of discrimination must be eliminated. Routing and scheduling of transportation must be planned on the basis of such factors as economy and efficiency, and may not operate to impede desegregation. Routes and schedules must be changed to the extent necessary to comply with this provision.

(3) All school-related use of athletic fields, meeting rooms, and all other school-related services, facilities, activities, and programs, such as commencement exercises and parent-teacher meetings, which are open to persons other than enrolled students, must be open to all such persons and must be conducted without segregation or any other form of discrimination.

(4) All special educational programs, such as pre-school, summer school and adult education, and any educational program newly instituted, must be conducted without segregation or any other form of discrimination. Free choice desegregation procedures normally may not be applied to such programs.

§ 181.15 Unequal Educational Programs and Facilities

In addition to the changes made in student assignment practices under its desegregation plan, each school system is responsible for removing all other forms of discrimination on the ground of race, color, or national origin. For example, some school systems still maintain small, inadequate schools that were originally established for students of a particular race and are still used primarily or exclusively for the education of students of such race. If the facilities, teaching materials, or educational program available to students in such a school are inferior to those generally available in the schools of the system, the school authorities will normally be required immediately to assign such students to other schools in order to discontinue the use of the inferior school.

§ 181.16 Attendance Outside School System of Residence

No arrangement may be made nor permission granted for students residing in one school system to attend school in another school system in any case (1) where the result would tend to limit desegregation or maintain what is essentially a dual school structure in either system, or (2) where such attendance is not available to all students without regard to race, color, or national origin.

§ 181.17 Official Support for Desegregation Plan

(a) Community Support. School officials must take steps to encourage community support and acceptance of their desegregation plan. They are responsible for preparing students, teachers and all other personnel, and the community in general, for the successful desegregation of the school system.

(b) Information to the Public. Full information concerning the desegregation plan must be furnished freely to the public and to all television and radio stations and all newspapers serving the community. Copies of all reports on student and staff assignments required under § 181.18 below must be available for public inspection at the office of the Superintendent of the school system.

(c) Protection of Persons Affected. Each school system is responsible for the effective implementation of its desegregation plan. Within their authority, school officials are responsible for the protection of persons exercising rights under, or otherwise affected by, the plan. They must take appropriate action with regard to any student or staff member who interferes with the successful operation of the plan, whether or not on school grounds. If officials of the school system are not able to provide sufficient protection, they must seek whatever assistance is necessary from other appropriate officials.

§ 181.18 Reports

(a) Anticipated Enrollment. By April 15 of each year, or by 15 days after the close of the choice period in the case of plans based on free choice of schools, each school system must report to the Commissioner the anticipated student enrollment, by race, color, or national origin, and by grade of each school, for the following school year. Any subsequent substantial change in anticipated enrollment affecting desegregation must be reported promptly to the Commissioner.

(b) Planned Staff Assignments. By April 15 of each year, each school system must report to the Commissioner the planned assignments of professional staff to each school for the following year, by race, color, or national origin and by grade, or where appropriate, by subject taught or position held. Any subsequent change in planned staff assignments affecting staff desegregation must be reported promptly to the Commissioner.

(c) Actual Data. As soon as possible after the opening of its schools in the fall, but in any case within 30 days thereafter, each school system must determine and promptly report to the Commissioner the actual data for the items covered in the reports called for under (a) and (b) above.

(d) Attendance Outside System of Residence. The reports called for under (a) and (c) above must include a statement covering (1) all students who reside within the boundaries of the school system but attend school in another system, and (2) all students who reside outside but attend a school within the system. This statement must set forth, for each group of students included in (1) and (2) above, the number of students, by race, color, or national origin, by grade, by school and school system attended, and by school system of residence.

(e) Consolidation or Litigation . A school system which is to undergo consolidation with another system or any other change in its boundaries, or which is involved in any litigation affecting desegregation, must promptly report the relevant facts and circumstances to the Commissioner.

(f) Other Reports. The Commissioner may require a school system to submit other reports relating to its compliance with Title VI.

§ 181.19 Records

A school system must keep available for not less than three years all records relating to personnel actions, transportation, including routes and schedules, and student assignments and transfers, including all choice forms and transfer applications submitted to the school system. The Commissioner may require retention for a longer period in individual cases.

[§§ 181.20 through 181.30 reserved]

Subpart C—Additional Requirements for Voluntary Desegregation Plans Based on Geographic Attendance Zones

§ 181.31 General

A voluntary desegregation plan based in whole or in part on geographic attendance zones must meet the requirements of this Subpart for all students whose assignment to schools is determined by such zones. The general requirement for desegregation plans set forth elsewhere in this Statement of Policies are also applicable.

§ 181.32 Attendance Zones

A single system of non-racial attendance zones must be established. A school system may not use zone boundaries or feeder patterns designed to perpetuate or promote segregation, or to limit desegregation or maintain what is essentially a dual school structure. A school system planning (1) to desegregate certain grades by means of geographic attendance zones and other grades by means of free choice of schools, or (2) to include more than one school of the same level in one or more attendance zones and to offer free choice of all schools within such zones, must show that such an arrangement will most expeditiously eliminate segregation and all other forms of discrimination. In any such case, the procedures followed for the offer, exercise and administration of free choice of schools must conform to the provisions of Subpart D below.

§ 181.33 Assignment to School in Zone of Residence

Regardless of any previous attendance at another school, each student must be assigned to the school serving his zone of residence, and may be transferred to another school only in those cases which meet the following requirements:

(a) Transfer for Special Needs. A student who requires a course of study not offered at the school serving his zone, or who is physically handicapped, may be permitted, upon his written application, to transfer to another school which is designed to fit, or offers courses for, his special needs.

(b) Minority Transfer Policy. A school system may (1) permit any student to transfer from a school where students of his race are a majority to any other school, within the system, where students of his race are a minority, or (2) assign students on such basis.

(c) Special Plan Provisions. A student who specifically qualifies to attend another school pursuant to the provisions of a desegregation plan accepted by the Commissioner may be permitted, upon his written application, to transfer to such other school.

§ 181.34 Notice

(a) Individual Notice. On a convenient date between March 1 and April 30 in each year, each school system must distribute, by first class mail, a letter to the parent, or other adult person acting as parent, of each student who is then enrolled, except high school seniors expected to graduate, giving the name and location of the school to which the student has been assigned for the coming school year pursuant to the desegregation plan, and information concerning the bus service between his school and his neighborhood. All these letters must be mailed on the same day. Each letter must be accompanied by a notice, in a form prescribed by the Commissioner, explaining the desegregation plan. The same letter and notice must also be furnished, in person or by mail, to the parent of each prospective student, including each student planning to enter the first grade or kindergarten, as soon as the school system learns that he plans to enroll.

(b) Published Notice. The school system must arrange for the conspicuous publication of an announcement, identical with the text of the notice provided for under (a) above, in the newspaper most generally circulated in the community, on or shortly before the date of mailing under (a) above. Publication as a legal notice is not sufficient. Whenever any revision of attendance zones is proposed, the school system must similarly arrange for the conspicuous publication of an announcement at least 30 days before any change is to become effective, naming each school to be affected and describing the proposed new zones. Copies of all material published hereunder must also be given at that time to all television and radio stations serving the community.

(c) Maps Available to Public. A street or road map showing the boundaries of, and the school serving, each attendance zone must be freely available for public inspection at the office of the Superintendent. Each school in the system must have freely available for public inspection a map showing the boundaries of its attendance area.

§ 181.35 Reports

(a) Attendance Zones. The report submitted under § 181.18(a) by April 15 of each year must be accompanied by a map, which must show the name and location of each school facility planned to be used during the coming school year, the attendance zones for each school in effect during the current school year, and any changes in the attendance zones planned for the coming school year. The map need not be of professional quality. A clipping of each newspaper announcement and any map published under § 181.34 (b) or (c) above must be sent to the Commissioner within three days after publication and, in the case of proposed revisions, must be accompanied by data showing the estimated change in attendance, by race, color, or national origin and by grade, and in the racial composition of the professional staff, at each school to be affected.

(b) Attendance Outside Zone of Residence. Whenever a student is permitted to attend a school other than that serving his zone of residence, and whenever a request for such attendance is denied, the school system must retain records showing (1) the school and grade applied for, (2) the zone of the student's residence and his grade therein, (3) the race, color, or national origin of the student, (4) the reason stated for the request, and (5) the reason the request is granted or denied. Whenever the total number of transfers permitted from any school exceeds two percent of the student enrollment at that school, the relevant facts must be reported promptly to the Commissioner.

[§§ 181.36 through 181.40 reserved]

Subpart D—Additional Requirements for Voluntary Desegregation Plans Based on Free Choice of Schools

§ 181.41 General

A voluntary desegregation plan based in whole or in part on free choice of schools must meet the requirements of this Subpart for all students whose assignment to schools is determined by free choice. The general requirements for desegregation plans set forth elsewhere in this Statement of Policies are also applicable.

§ 181.42 Who May Exercise Choice

A choice of schools may be exercised by a parent or other adult person serving as the student's parent. A student may exercise his own choice if he (1) is exercising a choice for the ninth or a higher grade, or (2) has reached the age of fifteen at the time of the exercise of choice. Such a choice by a student is controlling unless a different choice is exercised for him by his parent, or other adult person acting as his parent, during the period in which the student exercises his choice. Each reference in this Subpart to a student exercising a choice means the exercise of the choice by a parent or such other adult, or by the student himself, as may be appropriate under this provision.

§ 181.43 Annual Mandatory Exercise of Choice

Each student must be required to exercise a free choice of schools once annually. A student may not be enrolled or assigned to a school without exercising his choice, except as provided in § 181.45 below.

§ 181.44 Choice Period

A period of at least 30 days must be provided for exercising choice, to commence no earlier than January 1 and to end no later than April 30, preceding the school year for which choice is to be exercised. The Commissioner may require an additional period or different dates for a particular school system. No preference in school assignment may be given on the basis of an early exercise of choice during the choice period.

§ 181.45 Failure To Exercise Choice

A failure to exercise a choice within the choice period does not excuse a student from exercising his choice, which may be done at any time before he commences school for the year with respect to which the choice applies. However, any such late choice must be subordinated to the choices of students who exercised choice during the choice period. If by a week after school opens there is any student who has not yet exercised his choice of school, he must be assigned to the school nearest his home where space is available. Standards for determining available space must be applied uniformly throughout the system.

§ 181.46 Letters to Parents, Notices, and Choice Forms

(a) Mailings. On the first day of the choice period, each school system must distribute, by first class mail, a letter, an explanatory notice, and a choice form, to the parent or other adult person acting as parent of each student who is then enrolled, except high school seniors expected to graduate, together with a return envelope addressed to the Superintendent. The texts for the letter, notice, and choice form to be used must be in a form prescribed by the Commissioner.

(b) Extra Copies. Extra copies of the letter, the notice, and the choice form must be freely available to parents, students, prospective students, and the general public, at each school in the system and at the office of the Superintendent.

(c) Content of Choice Form. Unless otherwise authorized or required by the Commissioner, each choice form, as prepared by the school system for distribution, (1) must set forth the name and location of, and the grades offered at, each school, and (2) may inquire of the person exercising the choice only the name, address, and age of the student, the school and grade currently or most recently attended by the student, the school chosen, the signature of one parent or other adult person serving as parent or, where appropriate under § 181.42 above, the signature of the student, and the identity of the person signing. If necessary to provide information required by §§ 181.18 and 181.19 above, or for other reports required by the Commissioner, the choice form may also ask the race, color, or national origin of the student. No statement of reasons for a particular choice, or any other information, or any witness or other authentication, may be required or requested. No other choice form, including any pupil placement law form may be used by the school system in connection with the choice of a school.

(d) Return of Choice Form. At the option of the person completing the choice form, it may be returned by mail or by hand to any school in the school system or to the office of the Superintendent.

(e) Choices Not on Official Form. Exercise of choice may also be made by the submission in like manner of any other writing which sufficiently identifies the student and indicates that he has made a choice of a school.

§ 181.47 Prospective Students

Each prospective student, including each student planning to enter the first grade or kindergarten, must be required to exercise a free choice of schools before enrollment. Each such student must be furnished a copy of the prescribed letter, notice, and choice form, by mail or in person, on the date the choice period opens or as soon thereafter as the school system learns that he plans to enroll. Each must be given an opportunity to exercise his choice during the choice period. A prospective student exercising his choice after the choice period must be given at least one week to do so.

§ 181.48 Choice May Not Be Changed

Once a choice has been submitted, it may not be changed for the school year to which it applies, whether during the choice period, after the choice period, or during that school year, except on request (1) in cases meeting the conditions set forth in § 181.50 below, (2) in case of a change of residence to a place where another school serving the student's grade level is closer than the school to which he is assigned under these provisions, and (3) in case of a compelling hardship. A student who cannot enter the school of his choice because the grade he is to enter is not offered at that school must be promptly notified as soon as this is known and must be given the same opportunity to choose another school as is provided a prospective student under § 181.47 above.

§ 181.49 Assignment According to Choice

No choice may be denied in assigning students to schools for any reason other than overcrowding. In cases where overcrowding would result at one or more schools from the choices made, preference must be given on the basis of the proximity of schools to the homes of students, without regard to race, color, or national origin. No preference may be given to students for prior attendance at a school if such preference would deny other students their free choice of schools under the plan. In cases where this provision would result in unusual difficulty involving, for instance, students not being able to finish their senior year in a particular school, or students being unable to attend school with other members of the same family, or at a school having special courses required by a student, the relevant facts may be brought to the attention of the Commissioner for consideration of alternative procedures. Any student whose choice is denied under these provisions must be notified in writing promptly and given his choice of each school in the system serving his grade level where space is available. Standards for determining overcrowding and available space that are applied uniformly throughout the system must be used if any choice is to be denied. Each student and his parent, or other adult person acting as parent, must be notified in writing of the name and location of the school to which the student is assigned hereunder promptly upon completion of processing his first or any second choice. A school system may, at its option, give preference to any student whose choice is for a school at which students of his race are a minority.

§ 181.50 Transfers for Special Needs

Each student must attend the school to which he is assigned under the foregoing provisions, except that any student who requires a course of study not offered at that school, or who is physically handicapped, may be permitted, upon his written application, to transfer to another school which is designed to fit, or offers courses for, his special needs.

§ 181.51 No Limitation of Choice; Transportation

No factor, such as a requirement for health or birth records, academic or physical examinations, the operation of the school transportation system, or any other factor except overcrowding, may limit or affect the assignment of students to schools on the basis of their choices. Where transportation is generally provided, buses must be routed to the maximum extent feasible so as to serve each student choosing any school in the system. In any event, every student choosing either the formerly white or the formerly Negro school (or other school established for students of a particular race, color, or national origin) nearest his residence must be transported to the school to which he is assigned under these provisions, whether or not it is his first choice, if that school is sufficiently distant from his home to make him eligible for transportation under generally applicable transportation rules.

§ 181.52 Officials Not To Influence Choice

No official, teacher, or employee of the school system may require or request any student or prospective student to submit a choice form during the choice period other than by the prescribed letter, notice, and choice form. After the choice period, the school system must make all reasonable efforts to obtain a completed choice form from any student who has not exercised a choice. However, at no time may any official, teacher, or employee of the school system, either directly or indirectly, seek to influence any parent, student, or any other person involved, in the exercise of a choice, or favor or penalize any person because of a choice made. Information concerning choices made by individual students or schools to which they are assigned may not be made public.

§ 181.53 Public Notice

On or shortly before the date the choice period opens, the school system must arrange for the conspicuous publication of a notice describing the desegregation plan in the newspaper most generally circulated in the community. The text of the notice must be in a form prescribed by the Commissioner. Publication as a legal notice is not sufficient. Copies of this notice must also be given at that time to all radio and television stations serving the community. Any other announcement published by the school system concerning enrollment, such as might be made in connection with scheduling pre-enrollment procedures for prospective first grade students, must (1) state clearly that under the desegregation plan a choice of school is required for each student whose choice has not yet been exercised, (2) describe and state where copies of the prescribed letter, notice and choice form may be freely obtained in person, or by letter or telephone request, and (3) state the period during which the choice may be exercised.

§ 181.54 Requirements for Effectiveness of Free Choice Plans

A free choice plan tends to place the burden of desegregation on Negro or other minority group students and their parents. Even when school authorities undertake good faith efforts to assure its fair operation, the very nature of a free choice plan and the effect of longstanding community attitudes often tend to preclude or inhibit the exercise of a truly free choice by or for minority group students.

For these reasons, the Commissioner will scrutinize with special care the operation of voluntary plans of desegregation in school systems which have adopted free choice plans.

In determining whether a free choice plan is operating fairly and effectively, so as to materially further the orderly achievement of desegregation, the Commissioner will take into account such factors as community support for the plan, the efforts of the school system to eliminate the identifiability of schools on the basis of race, color, or national origin by virtue of the composition of staff or other factors, and the progress actually made in eliminating past discrimination and segregation.

The single most substantial indication as to whether a free choice plan is actually working to eliminate the dual school structure is the extent to which Negro or other minority group students have in fact transferred from segregated schools. Thus, when substantial desegregation actually occurs under a free choice plan, there is strong evidence that the plan is operating effectively and fairly, and is currently acceptable as a means of meeting legal requirements. Conversely, where a free choice plan results in little or no actual desegregation, or where, having already produced some degree of desegregation, it does not result in substantial progress, there is reason to believe that the plan is not operating effectively and may not be an appropriate or acceptable method of meeting constitutional and statutory requirements.

As a general matter, for the 1967–68 school year the Commissioner will, in the absence of other evidence to the contrary, assume that a free choice plan is a viable and effective means of completing initial stages of desegregation in school systems in which a substantial percentage of the students have in fact been transferred from segregated schools. Where a small degree of desegregation has been achieved and, on the basis of the free choice registration held in early 1967, it appears that there will not be a substantial increase in desegregation for the 1967–68 school year, the Commissioner will review the working of the plan and will normally require school officials to take additional actions as a prerequisite to continued use of a free choice plan, even as an interim device.

In districts with a sizable percentage of Negro or other minority group students, the Commissioner will, in general, be guided by the following criteria in scheduling free choice plans for review:

(1) If a significant percentage of the students, such as 8 percent or 9 percent, transferred from segregated schools for the 1966–67 school year, total transfers on the order of at least twice that percentage would normally be expected.

(2) If a smaller percentage of the students, such as 4 percent or 5 percent, transferred from segregated schools for the 1966–67 school year, a substantial increase in transfers would normally be expected, such as would bring the total to at least triple the percentage for the 1966–67 school year.

(3) If a lower percentage of students transferred for the 1966–67 school year, then the rate of increase in total transfers for the 1967–68 school year would normally be expected to be proportionately greater than under (2) above.

Where there is substantial deviation from these expectations, and the Commissioner concludes, on the basis of the choices actually made and other available evidence, that the plan is not operating fairly, or is not effective to meet constitutional and statutory requirements, he will require the school system to take additional steps to further desegregation.

Such additional steps may include, for example, reopening of the choice period, additional meetings with parents and civic groups, further arrangements with State or local officials to limit opportunities for intimidation, and other further community preparation. Where schools are still identifiable on the basis of staff composition as intended for students of a particular race, color, or national origin, such steps must in any such case include substantial further changes in staffing patterns to eliminate such identifiability.

If the Commissioner concludes that such steps would be ineffective, or if they fail to remedy the defects in the operation of any free choice plan, he may require the school system to adopt a different type of desegregation plan.

§ 181.55 Reports

(a) Supporting Materials. Each school sysmust submit to the Commissioner a copy of the letter, notice, and choice form, all as prepared by the school system for distribution, within three days after their first distribution, and must submit a clipping of all newspaper announcements published in accordance with § 181.53 above within three days after publication.

(b) Data on Choices Not Being Honored. In any case, including the case of conflicting choices under § 181.42 above, where a student chooses a school where he would be in a racial minority, and (1) he is to be assigned to a school where he would be in a racial majority, or (2) the school system proposes not to process his choice for any reason, the relevant facts must be reported promptly to the Commissioner.

(c) Transfers for Special Needs. Wherever a student is permitted, under §§ 181.48 or 181.50 above, to attend a school other than the school to which he is or would be assigned under the other applicable provisions hereof, and whenever a request for such attendance is denied, the school system must retain records showing (1) the school and grade applied for, (2) the school and grade to be transferred from, (3) the race, color, or national origin of the student, (4) the reason stated for the request, and (5) the reason the request is granted or denied. Whenever the total number of transfers permitted from any school exceeds two percent of the student enrollment at that school, the relevant facts must be reported promptly to the Commissioner.

SCHOOL DESEG.

Wallace Challenged On Guideline Evasion

BIRMINGHAM, June 11 (UPI). A top federal civil rights official Saturday challenged Gov. George Wallace's pledge to use state school surplus funds to avoid compliance with new federal desegregation guidelines.

William L. Taylor, staff director U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, said "massive resistance" by Alabama leaders to the school desegregation guidelines was a futile course.

"The governor of your state has suggested . . . that Alabama will not lose anything if it foregoes federal financial support of the public school because there is an $80 million surplus in a special education trust fund which can be used to replace money from Washington.

"I would submit that there can be no surplus in funds available for education, particularly for a state that ranks 48 among the 50 in pupil expenditures."

Taylor's remarks about Alabama's low national ranking in education brought applause and laughter from the more than 1,000 educators and civil rights officials who attended a conference on the new guidelines.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

U.S. Hasn't Violated Law On Guidelines, Howe Says

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — U.S. education Commissioner Harold Howe insisted before the House Rules committee Friday that his office has not stepped outside the law in setting desegregation guidelines and getting local schools to comply.

Southerners and Republicans on the committee pressed Howe with questions about reports that guideline compliance officers were using pressure and "harrassment" to achieve racial balance within local school districts.

A standing-room-only crowd of congressmen and reporters attended the committee hearing, described by a Northern moderate congressman as "a Roman holiday."

Attending was Georgia Rep. John J. Flynt Jr.

Friday's session was ostensibly to help committee members decide on a resolution by Rep. Charles W. Andrews, D-Ala., to set up a five-man select committee to investigate the legality of the guidelines and the way they are being administered.

Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith, D-Va., had already ceded jurisdiction on the guidelines investigation to the House Judiciary Committee Thursday morning, but decided to go ahead with the Howe testimony anyway.

Howe told committee members the guidelines were authorized under the 1964 Civil Rights Act to "help school districts stay in compliance so that federal funds may flow to the benefit of school children."

The commissioner denied charges that the Office of Education's compliance officers had pressured school districts to achieve racial balance, which is specifically prohibited by Title IV of the 1964 Act.

"We're not engaged in anything of that sort," Howe said.

He also denied that compliance officials had insisted school districts adopt busing between schools as a way to achieve desegregation.

"That's purely a decision for the local school system," he said.

"That's an interesting statement," Smith shot back. "It would be reassuring if you could get your thousands of field representatives to carry it out."

The Virginian asked Howe to comment on reports that compliance officers have been "harassing" local school officials.

"We've investigated those complaints," Howe replied, "and we found most of our people are doing the job right. Any harassment has been vastly exaggerated."

At that, Smith glared at the commissioner and said: "If you don't know the uprising in your country about your agents trying to make students of one race go to school with students of another, you don't know what's going on."

Howe also defended his office's requirements for faculty desegregation and denied they could be constructed as "controlling local employment practices." — an action prohibited by the Civil Rights Act.

HE'S COMMISSIONER
Harold Howe

The commissioner did admit, however, that his office "created a problem for school districts and ourselves" by issuing revised guidelines in March 1966, instead of January.

"It would have been better if local school officials had had more time for planning," Howe said.

Georgia's Flynt had submitted a resolution similar to the Andrews proposal which brought Friday's testimony.

Flynt said he thought Howe's testimony "affirmed the accuracy" of complaints Flynt had made about the actions of compliance officers last August in Griffin. (Story on Page 3.)

Meanwhile, as the Rules Committee met in relative quiet, South Carolina Rep. L. Mendel Rivers let loose a scathing attack on Howe on the House floor.

"This man talks like a Communist," Rivers said of Howe. "That is why those of us who know him have called him the commissar of education."

The South Carolinian called Howe a "misfit . . . a foul blot on the escutcheon of decency . . . and an idiot."

"He is destroying the school system of America lock, stock and barrel," Rivers stormed. "And, as a windfall, destroying in my part of the country, the party of which I am a part."

Rivers is a Democrat.

Another congressman, Rep. William Ryan, D.-N.Y., called Rivers' statement "shocking."

Behind the Guidelines

Many Georgia schools may be doing a better job of desegregating than they have admitted. But confession is apparently a prerequisite to redemption. At least that seems to be the reading given to the situation by an official of the U.S. Office of Education.

In a long distance conversation Tuesday, the official said only 96 school districts in the nation have failed to qualify for federal funds due to faults in their Form 441Bs, the forms that certify their intent to comply with desegregation guidelines.

Of the 96, 54 are in Georgia.

Does that mean these school districts are dodging desegregation more blatantly than others?

On the contrary, the official said, many of these Georgia school districts are desegregating in far better faith than other Southern school districts which have signed the certificates but failed to perform.

Then why doesn't the Office of Education stop bucking the Form 441Bs back to Georgia school districts and simply qualify them on the basis of their performance?

Because, the official said, government lawyers have warned that acceptance of serious modifications in the certificates could destroy the guidelines. If some school districts were permitted to exempt themselves from parts of the guidelines of their own choosing, they would clearly resurrect hopes that the guidelines will somehow go away.

How have Georgia school districts been trying to modify the guidelines? "Some say they will not desegregate faculty," the official said. "Some say they are going to follow last year's plan instead of this year's guidelines. Others say they won't open their enrollments for the full 30 days of free choice."

All such modifications have led to rejection of the certificates. "We are not going to let school districts exempt themselves," he said. "But the peculiar thing is, many of these school districts have performed in accordance with the desegregation guidelines—and just won't sign and send in an acceptable certificate on their performance."

It was pretty clear that the Office of Education is eager to qualify such Georgia school districts if they will simply quit modifying the guidelines to suit themselves, and will just send them in. It's a paper argument.

The real issue—desegregation performance when schools open—will be judged later. Schools that have made a good faith start, even if they don't come up to the voluntary percentages of desegregation suggested in the guidelines, are unlikely to have any trouble with the government this year.

Its emphasis is going to be on crackdowns in those school districts that have done little or nothing, starting from the bottom up. So those schools that have done something, in good faith, can rest fairly well assured of government approval if they'll simply settle their paper technicalities and mail in Form 441Bs that the government can accept.

SELMA INTER-RELIGIOUS PROJECT

The word SELMA was on everyone's lips a year ago.

The SELMA INTER-RELIGIOUS PROJECT is continuing the relationship between the people of Black Belt Alabama and the religious organizations that responded to Dr. King's call last March. The organizations that make up this Project have pledged that their presence in Selma last March will be continued through this ministry.

May we use this bulletin to introduce you to the Selma Inter-religious Project and to outline the work being done.

The Project was formally organized in October 1965. Before that time many persons including Jonathan Daniels had remained in Selma to continue a ministry of presence on a temporary and volunteer basis.

Some twelve organizations currently belong to the Project. Four have been designated as sponsors. They make up the Steering Committee.

The Nat'l Catholic Conference For Inter-racial Justice: Mr. John P. Sisson 8017 Palm St. New Orleans, La.

The Nat'l Council of Churches of Christ Comm. on Religion and Race: The Rev'd Bruce Hanson 475 Riverside Drive New York City.

The Synagogue Council of America: Rabbi Balfour Brickner 838 5th Ave. New York City.

The Unitarian-Universalist Assoc: Dr. Homer Jack 25 Beacon Street Boston, Mass.

Mr. Mel Dubin, a businessman from New York, has agreed to be the chairman and will guide the meetings of the Steering Committee.

The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity is a member and was most instrumental in establishing the project. Your address in fact, came to us through the Director, John Morris who supplied the Selma Inter-religious Project with E.S.C.R.U.'s "key persons" mailing list.

The overall job is to continue and develop the relationship between religious institutions and the Civil Rights Movement in Selma and Black Belt Alabama. For instance, we hope you will be able to act on the appeal in the enclosed leaflet "HELP DECENT HOUSING". Surely large and prosperous churches could consider this a legitmate extension of their concern. We hope so. The risk involved is very small.

The Director, the Rev'd Francis Walter, is an Episcopal priest and a native of Alabama. He has found that his pastoral ministry to individuals has been greater than he imagined. White Alabamians, the young people who have remained in Selma from all over the country, and civil rights workers have provided many occasions for a pastor

The Project also oversees and places volunteers who wish to work in Alabama under its direction. We have been able to bring in speakers and experts to assist in workshops and study groups.

During the past two months Fr. Walter has volunteered most of his time as a fact gatherer in Wilcox County, which is just below Selma. The people there are busy gathering the statistical information necessary to fill out application forms for the housing project, an FHA financed co-op farm, and OEO sponsored adult education, Head Start, and Day Care Centers.

The most delicate work has been in attempting to interpret the Movement to Alabama white people. We have also been able to do a little in bringing whites and Negroes together for common projects in Alabama. Can you believe there is even talk of organizing an integrated church in Selma?

The most pure fun has been enjoyed in founding "The Freedom Quilting Bee of Wilcox County." This is an ever growing cooperative of women who wish to market quilts out of Alabama. Profits will ultimately be lent as in a credit union to buy sewing machines or finance other money making projects.

Last, but most important, is the use of creative imagination to envision the resources of Project members and apply them to the needs of Selma and the Black Belt. New ideas and new ventures in cooperation do constantly occur.

We would like to offer our services to you or your organization. Perhaps you would like to be a part of the Project, formally or informally. If you would like the receive The Project Newsletter you have only to let us know.

The budget for this year is $16,000. We are far from having raised this amount. We very much need contributions to continue this year and must soon begin to raise money for the second year.

Your contributions would be appreciated. Checks may be made out to any of the sponsors and earmarked for S.I.P. or may be made out to

HELP FOR DECENT HOUSING IN BLACK BELT ALABAMA

Readers of the Selma Inter-religious Project Newsletter are aware of the evictions and loan foreclosures that have harassed Negroes in Alabama who have registered to vote.

The people of Wilcox County are doing something about it. The non-profit Wilcox County Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Inc. has applied to the Farmers Home Administration and the Office of Economic Opportunity for assistance with two housing programs.

The first is a project to build 50 houses on 35 acres already owned by the group. A Texas manufacturer is supplying pre-fab houses. A family can join this project, getting a house and lot for $3500.00. Payments go for 20 years. This is possible through F.H.A. financing under the Rural Housing Act of 1949 last amended 1964.

The second housing program will assist those too poor to qualify for even the most generous terms allowed by Farmers Home Administration. Most Negro farmers in Wilcox are too poor to qualify for this credit. According to the U.S. Census in 1959 the median income for non-white families in Wilcox was $1,081; but out of 2,600 Negro families 1,200 made less than $1000.00.

Title III. B. of the Economic Opportunity Act offers help in housing for seasonal or migrant workers, this includes sharecroppers.

Therefore the Rev'd Dan Harrell, director of the Wilcox group, has applied to the Office of Economic Opportunity for what is called a self-help housing grant under Title III. B. The most recent example of this type of project is in Chester County, Pennslyvania.

A group of families is selected who will build their own houses. The O.E.O. grants each family $1500.00 thus qualifying them for F.H.A. credit. The group is funded to hire a sort of combination social worker and building contractor who directs the families in the construction of their own homes. Thus skills are learned and pride is generated.

We are writing you because you may be able to help these people.

The Rev'd Dan Harrell has appealed to the Selma Inter-religious Project to find churches, synagogues, clubs, and labor unions that are willing to demonstrate their confidence in the people of Wilcox County.

Mr. Braxton LeCroy, the county F.H.A. agent, has agreed that in some cases he would allow groups out of the county or state to co-sign the F.H.A. loans. He feels this would better the chances of some families to gain loans. A group would in effect adopt a family. No note would exceed $3500.00.

The religious groups of this nation created a firm bond with the Negroes of Alabama during the dramatic crisis in Selma. That bond still exists. This appeal is the legitimate development of less dramatic but no less signifcant co-operation.

Isolation and alienation are the facts of life for Negroes in Wilcox County. These facts can be changed by the interest and confidence of a co-signer organization.

This has been well stated in the recent Unitarian publication "The Reeb Murder Trial".

> "Both the death of James Reeb and all his companions in the civil rights struggle, and the infuriating inability of the Southern courts to grapple with the issue, point to the problem and the same solution. The insularity of the embattled community must be broken. The resources for a larger community must be uncovered and drawn out. It may be possible to accomplish some of this by further exercise of federal authority ... But this is not the best answer, a measure to be taken in desperation only. Nor will it directly meet the underlying problem, which is the alienated community.
> The only answer is to bring the Selmas and Haynevilles into the American community at a far deeper level than they have yet been willing to come. And this will be accomplished, it seems to me, less by new legislation, than by the quiet but determined work of individuals and groups to take advantage of the ground already gained, to undercut devisive anxieties, and prepare the way for the voluntary relinquishing of attitudes that are no longer useful nor attractive.
> I say this... to encourage the constructive work at deeper levels without which further progress seems a vain hope... This, I think, is what James Reeb would have worked for too."

If you are interested and want more details please write us. thank you.

The Selma Inter-religious Project is a joint effort of over a dozen organizations and denominations to continue the relationship established between these groups and the people of Selma and Black Belt Alabama. The Chairman of the Project is Mr. Mel Dubin, a New York businessman. Four groups act as national sponsors. They are:

The Commission on Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches of Christ.
The National Catholic Conference for Inter-racial Justice.
The Synagogue Council of America.
The Unitarian-Universalist Association.

WISHING HOLIDAY GREETINGS to our readers (who either belong to or have left almost every religious or ethical group in the country) poses social and theological problems. To avoid these problems allow me to be subjective and, as a Christian, to wish that you all may enjoy and show forth a certain love and respect for men. That is the love that moved the authors of the Gospels insistently to proclaim that their Lord was born in a shelter for animals and laid in a feed trough.

TWO ALABAMA CIVIL RIGHTS MURDERS WERE REPORTED in the second issue of this newsletter, February 1966. Samuel Younge Jr., a SNCC worker and student at Tuskegee Institute, was killed by a white service station operator named Segrest. January 23, 1966 I missed by less than two hours witnessing the murder of a Mr. Colston by a white farmer, Mr. Reaves, outside the Antioch Baptist Church in Camden, Alabama just before a civil rights meeting. Little stir was caused by these murders in Alabama or the nation. The murdered men were black. Even less stir was caused last week when their killers were both acquitted by all white juries.

I give up. I mean journalistically. Why tell you about it? To request letters of protest? To call for legislation? To create public outcry? I'm not a federal employee so I don't have to appear constructive. I'm not a "New York Times" or "Birminghan News" editor. To earn a living I don't have to "influence" people. So let's call this news an exercise in futility.

The fact is the government and the overwhelming majority of our citizens are not only indifferent about bringing justice within the grasp of 20 million citizens, they are actively supporting a national way of life that keeps 20 million outside the pale of constitutional protection. And there is not one thing on the horizon that promises to change this.

THE SELMA INTER-RELIGIOUS PROJECT has survived financially into its second year. Last year's budget was $15,880,00, actual expenditures $15,722.95. We were saved by gifts from individuals. End of the year donations are certainly welcome. S.I.P. is not itself a tax deductible organization. Contributors who wish gifts to be tax deductible may donate through the sponsoring agencies or through Such donations should be ear-marked "Selma Inter-religious Project".

TWO 16 MM FILMS, ONE RELATING TO THE INTER-RELIGIOUS PROJECT are now available. The first film. "A Time For Burning" depicts a Lutheran parish congregation in a declining neighborhood. During the time of filming an innocent request to include Negroes in a church program erupted in bitter conflict. The cameras recorded it all and the American Lutheran Church had the guts to release it. It may be ordered from

Lutheran Film Associates
11 West 42nd Street
New York, New York 10036

"Lay My Burden Down", a National Education Television production, is the work of Jack Willis. It was my privilege to introduce Jack to contacts he needed to do the film. Several of my friends and associates are in it. It depicts with accuracy and compassion the conditions now, post Selma March, among local Negroes in Dallas and Wilcox counties— those for whom all the marching was done. I cannot recommend it too highly. If you've wanted to see where the Selma Inter-religious Project works this is your opportunity. Churches, Human Relations Councils, clubs and your state ETV network should show it.

It may be rented from

N.E.T. Film Service

A special note to Alabama readers: I checked, it has been routinely decided that the film will not be shown on Educational Television in Alabama. Please write

Mr. Graydon Ausmus

Ask that the N.E.T. film "Lay My Burden Down" be shown. ETV is sensitive to requests. If enough write it will be shown.

THE FREEDOM QUILTING BEE has a large stock of single and double bed quilts at $20 and $25 and bonnets at $3.00 for Christmas. Since March 1966 we have distributed $5500.00 in profits to co-op members. Our top earner has made over $200.00. She works six days a week as a cook and maid for $12.00. Some co-op members have augmented the family income from 10 to 25 per cent. I am so proud of the officers I could bust. But I am partial. As one man said last week, "That feller sho' is wrapped up in quilts."

AN UNUSUAL CONFERENCE WAS HELD Dec. 9, 10, and 11. It was called a Rural Life Workshop but it was sometimes called the School for White People. S.I.P. and the Pleasant Grove Baptist Church of Gees Bend, Wilcox County sponsored it. It was quite an experiment. Gees Bend is an all Negro community located in an isolated bend of the Alabama River below Selma. After a year of making friends and contacts in Alabama I felt I knew people well enough to hold such a workshop. Thirty-two people came, five from out of the state. Of the rest, twenty-seven were white Alabamians, five Negro. They came from Huntsville, Mobile, Birmingham, Tuscaloosa, and Montgomery. The panelists and teachers were all local Negro leaders from Wilcox and Dallas counties. Topics discussed were the local Movement, tenant farming, cooperatives, law enforcement, credit, education and politics-all as it effected Negroes in the Blace Belt. The people of Gees Bend came too. At times the large church was almost full. For most of the conferees it was the first time they had ever heard about conditions in the Black Belt straight from Negroes who knew how to tell it. The people of Gees Bend opened their homes and their hearts to us. Fried chicken, squirrel, sweet potato pie and chicory coffee abounded. What an experience. I'd been thinking about such a thing for months but finally found the courage to try. I hope to be able to report later on the reactions of the people who attended.

O.E.O. TITLE III B. PROGRAMS IN LOWNDES AND WILCOX were funded as we guessed ten days after the November elections. One can say this is the only rebuff George Wallace has received in over a year. OEO officials warned us board members that the attack to destroy these programs would be, if anything,more powerful than the forces that destroyed the C.D. G.M. in Mississippi.

The "Birmingham News" is waging war against the programs. In an exhaustive scrutiny the paper has interviewed absolutely everyone in Alabama about it; except of course, the chairmen or members of the two boards who are administering the programs.

I have attended my first two meetings as a member of the Lowndes board. I've met the white man in Lowndes who serves — brave man, but no braver than the black people who have struggled to develop the program. I heard that the white people who agreed to serve on the Wilcox board have written O.E.O. denying they were ever members. That's the way it goes. These boards have worked hard to invite everybody to participate. But it's almost impossible to find whites who are not either opposed or too afraid.

Basically these programs will provide pre-vocational education skills to adults. Many will be able to learn reading and writing. Day care centers for childern will also be operated. Participating childern will be able to receive milk and a well balanced meal. The cost of the two programs is $500,00.00.

SOUTHWEST ALABAMA SELF-HELP HOUSING is a non-profit organization created to apply for funds to administer an imagintive housing program in the rural Black Belt. I was asked to find some white people to serve on it. So far I have found five which is enough to start. There are about twenty people on the board. However, most of the members are working too hard to get the two funded programs going to begin the lengthy preliminary work of writing the application. Besides rural funds for such programs have just been cut way back by Congress. Yet as the Christmas and New Year's holidays begin how many families of tenant farmers will not have their contracts renewed and will face eviction from house and land? We have no way of knowing.

Senator Mansfield is quoted as saying we need a "pause" in the Great Society.

Merry Christmas Mr. and Mrs. Moorer; Merry Christmas Big Bill Williams; Merry Christmas Mr. Wiley Bell and family. Put up your Christmas tree anyway, it doesn't need to be in a house. You can dance around it to keep warm. You are a people who bear affliction lightly. You won't mind. But don't you listen to Stokely. He's no Santa Claus. We're here to tell you that Black Santa has not produced one present, not one goodie in the ten months he's been talking. You believe in Santas Mansfield, Dirksen, Johnson and Whitney Young, Jr. They got the bag haven't they?

You believe in them and you can be us white folks Holy Family. We won't have to build a little pine slab lean-to in front of the First Segregated Church. We won't have to get out our plywood Mary and Jesus. If you will truly accept Senator Mansfield and all his choir as Santas we'll let you stand around outside our church holding your children in your arms.

TEACHERS AND PARENTS IN ALABAMA ATTENTION. A large number of top grade Northern high schools are looking for very bright students. These schools are able to pay all expenses involved in sending a child off to get a wonderful education. Of course, only a very few are able to be selected. Here is what you do to find out more about it. If you know of a very bright child in your family or school, or if you just want to understand more about this opportunity, write me a letter. I will come to explain the program. The program takes some explaining. I had to study a lot of material before I understood it. It is mostly for students entering the ninth and tenth grades in the fall of 1967. There are only a very few places for children entering the eight and eleventh grades. I learned about the program too late to help many people this year. But the folks who run the program said any parent or teacher who knows a very bright and hard working student should encourage him to apply. The child would have to take a test in either Mobile, Montgomery, Tuskegee, or Birmingham Feb. 4, 1967. So you will have to contact me right away. If I possibly can I will travel to any school in the Black Belt to explain the program to teachers and parents. Any child accepted at one of these schools has almost a sure chance of being accepted in a college. Maybe only one child would go from Alabama this year or next. But still it's worth your interest. These schools are all finer schools than any private schools in Alabama, white or Negro.

THE CITIZENS CRUSADE AGAINST POVERTY based in Washington, deserves the respect and thanks of folks in Alabama. It is developing a program to create low cost housing. This is not a crisis orientated civil rights organization but a community development type organization. Clumsy terminology but it says it. It has centers now in Eutaw and Selma. It plans to open a concrete block plant in Greene County.

The Crusade has employed some experienced people to handle its Alabama program. Mr. Randolph Blackwell, formerly employed by S.C.L.C. is the overall director of this Southern program.

THE FREEDOM QUILTING BEE is still advertising for a manager at a salary around $5000.00. We could use two people if a couple want to apply but at the same salary. Returning Peace Corps Volunteers make good prospects. Know any? Please remember, almost all our good ideas and contacts have come from Newsletter readers.

Girls Be Drafted?

AC 4/26/66

--Or Pay Alimony?

WASHINGTON (AP)—Draft Maggie? Make Mildred pay alimony?

Could be, a New York congressman has suggested in backing a constitutional amendment to guarantee equal rights for women — and men.

The women need such a law because some states and localities still discriminate against them on a variety of matters, Rep. Theodore R. Kupferman declared. He named examples: Jury service, property rights, the right to control and own one's earnings.

But men need it, too, the Republican representative asserted, because he said there's "reverse discrimination which exists in some aspects of life where women are favored over men."

He cited "meter maids" and said New York and Los Angeles governments won't hire men to check on parking violations.

"There is another area where this amendment could have beneficial results for me," Kupferman said in a statement.

"I refer to alimony laws in this country which could be revised as a result of this amendment, so that women are not favored simply because of their sex."

He noted that it has been suggested that such a law could lead to compulsory military service for women, now exempt.

"It may be agreed that women could serve in various clerical or administrative capacities as well as men," he said, but added "this amendment does not overlook the natural or physical distinction between men and women."

Kupferman would add to the constitution an amendment that says "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex."

"A clear pronouncement of equality or rights for both sexes is long overdue in this country," he said.

Driving Big Truck Is Still a Man's Job Sighs Woman Who Tried Being 'Equal'

SEX DISCRIMINATION ACG 5/8/66

By SANDRA ALLEY

Uncle Sam opened the door to opportunity for women of America with the passage of H.R. 7152, but he may also have shattered the dreams of a few females.

To many a female mind, H.R. 7152, more commonly known as the Civil Rights Law, meant the passport to new adventures. At last woman can try her skill at the work or profession that before was only hidden ambition. No longer does she have to sit behind her ultra-modern typewriter and just DREAM about what it would be like to be a lumberjack or to pilot a commercial jetliner.

Her invitation to go into man's world comes under Section 703, paragraph (1) which reads: "It shall be . . . unlawful to fail or refuse to hire . . . any individual . . . because of such individual's race, color, regligion, sex or national origin. . . ."

That three-letter word, "sex," is no longer a hindrance.

TRADES IN LAB COAT

Saralyn Bone, a public health laboratory technologist at the Communicable Disease Center, decided to trade in her lab coat one night and find out what it was like to sit behind the wheel of a multi-geared trailer-truck. The thought of having the power to manipulate up to 72,000 pounds in her hands was too much to pass up.

"There she is," said an employe of a Georgia-owned truck line, as he pointed to one of the largest trucks on the lot.

Saralyn came face-to-face with the truck, which weighed up to 25,000 pounds without freight. Immediately her female mind went into action.

"Where's the running board?" she queried. There was none. With a bolting leap, Saralyn attempted a big stride to the first bar-type step.

"This is the first thing ladies would have changed," she said, as her right foot went searching for the next step. Three very big steps up and several minutes later, Saralyn was sitting in the cab of the truck.

CITY AT 6 O'CLOCK

"We're going to show you the city-run," said S. L. Moon, winner of a national champion truck-driving title. "You'll really get the feel of a truck — especially in six o'clock traffic."

Bolting along Jonesboro Road, part of the Expressway and a few streets Saralyn had not known existed, the two were on their way to pick-up some unknown freight at the Government Employe's Exchange (GEX) on the South Expressway.

"There are only certain roads we're authorized to drive on," Moon said.

"How many gears?" Saralyn said. "Ten," he answered. It had taken six just to pull out of the terminal lot.

"Do you think women would make good truck drivers," she asked, trying to find out his mind was on the situation.

HE'S WILLING

To her surprise, Moon answered in the affirmative.

"Women seem to be more courteous to truck drivers," he said. "More often they'll let a truck get by or enter a lane of traffic."

"It's like one big reducing machine," Saralyn said as they bounced and jerked along the roads. "It'll be smoother when we go back," the driver said. "The trailer is empty now."

Soon the truck pulled up to the shipping entrances along the rear of GEX Saralyn watched Moon and a GEX employe engage in what appeared to be a high-level conference. After several papers were signed and the transaction completed, the cargo was loaded into the rear of the truck.

The cargo turned out to be one stereo cabinet. Its weight didn't help to lessen the bumps on the return trip.

TRAFFIC IS FRIENDLY

Several rigs passed the big truck and each driver waved or honked at the other. Once a group of children started waving as if they were trying to pull down an imaginary, but heavy, rope.

Moon answered their motions with a blast of his horn. "That's just a friendly hello," he said. "Children always want to hear the horn of passing trucks."

When the rig pulled up to the freight terminal, Saralyn whobbled off. The terminal was breaming with activity as it was growing dark by then and soon the night out-of-town runs would begin.

Morris L. Shadburn Jr., an executive with the truck line, told Saralyn she would be going with another national champion driver, Paul Steed, oldest long - term driver there. His seniority entitles him to the pick of the routes and the choice of the cabs.

THE NIGHT RUN

Their destination would be Marietta — not Steed's regular route, but a distance long enough to give Saralyn the feel of a night run from Atlanta.

As with every truck that leaves the terminal, Steed's truck underwent a thorough safety test.

"How many tires does this truck have?" Saralyn asked. The answer was 18, and each tire was susceptible to becoming flat. The driver changes the tire if he has a flat on the trip.

The truck passed the check-up. Off to Marietta. Jolting along the Northeast Expressway, Saralyn found conversation wasn't easy over the roar of the eninges. Steed demonstrated the use of all ten gears as they maneuvered up a hill on the winding Marietta Highway. Passing motorists appeared to be zooming. Saralyn was almost as sure "her" truck was standing still.

It was hard to pass. It was hard to make time. You just sit and shift. But the veteran driver was as proud of his truck as any owners of the sleekest automobile.

NO WELCOMERS

When the truck pulled into the Marietta terminal, there was no one to welcome the arrivers. It was a lonely area filled with trailers either waiting to be attached to cabs with their freight already loaded, or empty trailers ready to be filled during the early morning hours.

Carrying 17,000 pounds of freight back to Atlanta that night, the truck arrived at the terminal.

"You really have to be good at parking," Saralyn said, as Steed easily put the van into reverse and moved to a space between two unattached trailers.

For Saralyn, her career as a trucker was over. For Steed the regular road to Tifton was still ahead of him.

"How did you like it?" asked Shadburn.

"Well," Saralyn answered," I sure have a lot more respect for truck drivers than I did before. It was great riding in the truck . . . but driving it? It takes more than that three-letter word."

Women Will Help Report Vote in Alabama Primary

BIRMINGHAM—More than 150 members of Alabama's League of Women Voters will play an active role in ABC News' radio and television coverage of the Alabama Democratic primary election Tuesday by reporting the up-to-the-minute vote tabulations from the network's selected statewide network of "key precincts."

The ladies will report the vote counts directly to the ABC News political "Brains Trust" in Birmingham.

"We have found that the League of Women Voters' organizations across the nation are consistently among the most politically alert, civic-minded and reliable election night report forces," said Arnold Snyder, manager of election coverage, in explaining why the group was chosen to serve as the "reporting staff" in Alabama's "key precincts."

Mrs. Leo Hirth of Auburn, Ala., the League's state coordinator for the project, has been working for the past two months with the network's election unit in recruiting "reporters" and researching the "key precincts."

200 Nuns Asking New Service Role

More than 200 Catholic nuns holding a Sisters' Conference in Atlanta Monday adopted a resolution asking that a provision be made for sisters to act as co-workers with priests in parish worship.

The resolution, one of four adopted, will be presented to the November synod meeting of the Atlanta Catholic arch diocese. The purpose of the Sisters Congress is to "explore the role of the sister in the Georgia diocese" and to prepare proposals to be presented to the synod meeting.

Other proposals adopted were: (1) To propose a council to deal with the continuing and total devolopment of the sister as a person (2) Asking that Catholic social service organizations collaborate with other existing social agencies and meet demands not being met by these other agencies; and (3) To create a health commission to explore the needs in the archdiocese and to serve in an advisory capacity in this field.

Voting on a fifth proposal, dealing with education, was postponed until a later date. The Sisters' Congress met Sunday and Monday at St. Joseph's High School.

ALABAMA WOMEN MASTER POLITICS

Led by Mrs. Wallace, They Are Taking Many Offices

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., May 14—Eight years ago, billboards in Alabama began asking, "Who is Bettye Frink?"

A few weeks later, another question was added: "What is her line—art, science or politics?"

Today, almost everyone in Alabama knows the answer. Mrs. Frink's line is politics, and largely because of her novel billboard approach to vote-getting, she is part of a wave of women who are taking over state government in Alabama.

While the nation's attention was focused on Mrs. George C. Wallace's successful Democratic primary race last week to succeed her husband as Governor, Mrs. Frink and other Alabama women were also meeting with success at the polls.

And if the Democratic nominees survive this fall's general election, Alabama will have not only a woman Governor, but also women as Secretary of State, State Treasurer, State Auditor and Public Service Commissioner.

This, many Alabama women believe, would be a record for any state.

Posts for Men

Of Alabama's elected executives, this leaves Lieutenant Governor, Attorney General, Agriculture Commissioner, Superintendent of Education and two public service commissioners for the men.

Already the chief judge of the state's second highest court—the Court of Appeals—is a woman.

And there is a possibility, too, that a woman will be elected to the United States House of Representatives. Miss Mary Grice, a former school teacher, led in the Democratic primary race for Congress from the district embracing Montgomery. She failed to get a majority of the vote, however, and must face Robert Whaley, a Montgomery businessman, in a runoff May 31. The winner will run against Representative William Dickinson, a Republican, in the general election.

Other women also face runoffs May 31 but they will be battling each other. Mrs. Frink, who is now the State Auditor, is in a runoff with Mrs. Agnes Baggett, the Secretary of State, for State Treasurer. And two newcomers to state politics—Mrs. Melba Till Allen and Mrs. Juanita McDaniel—are in a runoff to succeed Mrs. Frink as auditor.

Secretary to Governors

Mrs. Mabel Amos, who has been confidential secretary to Alabama Governors since the nineteen-thirties, entered elective politics this year and won the Democratic nomination for Secretary of State.

Mrs. Sibyl Pool began blazing the trail for women in politics during the World War II "manpower shortage" when she won a seat in the State Legislature and then used her record as a legislator to become Secretary of State. Because she was barred by the Constitution from succeeding herself as Secretary of State, she ran for Treasurer and then, finally, for her present seat on the Public Service Commission.

This set a precedent of women in these offices and they have held them ever since, adding State Auditor to their list.

Mrs. Frink, for example, was a 24-year-old housewife and secretary until her "who's Bettye Frink campaign" elected her Secretary of State in 1958 and as Auditor in 1962 and continued to perpetuate these jobs for women.

This year, however, men opposed women for Auditor and Secretary of State — arguing that if Mrs. Wallace could seek the governorship, men could seek "women's offices." But the men candidates went down in defeat, while Mrs. Wallace was winning.

"We know Mrs. Wallace was nominated for Governor mainly because she said she would let her husband run things," said Mrs. Frink. "But all the same, she'll get people used to having women in the Governor's office and that might make it possible for another woman to be elected Governor on her own."

Although women have been gradually expanding their influence in politics for years in Alabama, they could not serve as jurors in the state until three months ago when a Federal Court, acting in an American Civil Liberties Union case, struck down a state ban on women jurors.

"It was getting a litle ridiculous," said one Alabama woman, "to have state officials who were ineligible for jury service."

The Task Force of the Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women prepared this statement on the special problems of Negro women in the disadvantaged family with the same thought and in the same spirit expressed by the President's Commission on the Status of Women in its Report, AMERICAN WOMEN:

> "In making our proposals, we have had in mind the well-being of the entire society; their adoption would in many cases be of direct benefit to men as well as women."

AMERICAN WOMEN declared:

> "Seven million nonwhite women and girls belong to minority racial groups. ....discrimination currently places an oppressive dual burden on millions of Negro women....Such women are twice as likely as other women to have to seek employment while they have pre-school children at home; they are just beginning to gain entrance to the expanding fields of clerical and commercial employment; except for the few who can qualify as teachers or other professionals, they are forced into low-paid service occupations....in many of the families of these women the unbroken cycle of deprivation and retardation repeats itself from generation to generation, compounding its individual cost in human indignity and unhappiness and its social cost in incapacity and delinquency. THIS CYCLE MUST BE BROKEN, SWIFTLY AND AT AS MANY POINTS AS POSSIBLE."

I. The Nature of the Disadvantage

The Negro woman in the disadvantaged family suffers from a lack of many, if not most, of the things assumed to be part of the American way of living -- the things with which women in other families meet the challenge of their daily lives and build a future for themselves and their families. These lacks are many and cumulative. Those which bear most heavily include:

1. Lack of choice: The woman in the disadvantaged family must constantly respond to pressures, cope with impossible situations, somehow make-do. She has no margin for negotiating -- no margin of money, or of time, or of space, and, unless she has exceptional vigor and stamina, no margin of energy.

2. Lack of protection: She lacks a reasonable minimum of security, often even of physical safety. She has no cushion against misfortune, so that each misfortune is likely to become a disaster.

3. Lack of expectation: She has little prospect of a change of circumstances to carry her through present adversity.

4. Lack of power: She experiences helplessness and frustration, for she cannot control conditions around her or remedy them, whether she must waste half a day waiting at a clinic, or cannot shield her children from danger on the street and in dark hallways.

5. Lack of a sense of belonging: She is isolated, outside the mainstream of American life, for obviously the radio and TV advertisements, the suburban homes, travel, etc., are not meant for her.

6. Lack of respect: At best she is without positive recognition and respect. Too often she is the object of actual disrespect -- as a welfare recipient, an unmarried mother, a "poor housekeeper," etc.

7. Lack of a sense of accomplishment: Everything around her insists that she is a failure. She has few avenues of satisfaction open to her, for the odds against doing a good job are too heavy.

8. Lack of time: She is always having to cram too much into too little time. She spends long hours on a job; there are not enough hours for the family; she must do herself all the household things for which "typical" American homes use aids such as household equipment or pre-prepared food which she cannot afford. She has little time for rest, for social contacts, for participation in the life of the community and no time for herself -- to follow her interests and develop her skills.

9. Lack of space: The cramped living of the slum takes its toll.

10. Lack of comfort, beauty and cultural enrichment: These "pluses" of American life lie beyond the ghetto horizon.

It is these lacks which constitute the disadvantages from which the great majority of Negro women suffer. Whatever the source -- whether poverty, or discrimination, or physical or mental handicap, or inadequate education, or a broken home, or the insufficiency of jobs, housing or community services -- the result is the absence of what a person in American society today needs and is presumed to have in order to live effectively within that society, to develop his or her potential, to contribute as a citizen, a worker, a mother, and to realize the promise of American life. It is against the burden, the pressure, often the blank wall of these lacks that the woman in the disadvantaged family struggles, day in and day out, year in and year out, to get herself and her family by, to give her children a start and to help them to withstand the impact of these same lacks in their lives.

Because these lacks are multiple and cumulative, the plight of the woman in the disadvantaged family cannot be remedied by removing any single disadvantage. Each lack makes it more difficult to cope with the others. Only as mutually destructive disadvantages are replaced by a whole pattern of mutually reinforcing advantages can the disadvantaged woman be in a position to meet the demands of modern life on anything like the terms which other women enjoy.

II. What are the major causes of these lacks?

1. The number one cause is lack of income: The basic disadvantage is economic. In America in 1963, 2 million nonwhite women who were wives or heads of families (14 years of age or over) lived in families whose income fell below the current definition of "poverty," while an additional 527,000 who lived alone were likewise poor. Many have family incomes far below the "poverty" line. Of all families headed by a woman in 1963, 71 percent of the nonwhite and 31 percent of the white were poor. In 1963, a quarter of all nonwhite families had money incomes of less than $2,000 as compared with less than 10 percent of white families. Almost three times the proportion of nonwhite families tried to cope with money incomes of less than $1,000. Thus 9.2 percent of nonwhite families as compared with 3.2 percent of white families suffered this economic plight. And there are other uncounted women who live in poor families -- usually relatives of the family head or of the wife. While there are indeed some Negro women in disadvantaged families who do not suffer from economic deprivation but from some combination of other forms, for the great majority lack of adequate income is central.

The sole fact of poverty, whatever its source, creates a burden and a disadvantage for the woman who must meet the daily needs of herself and her family. Whatever may be its additional effects, and these are many, poverty in and of itself stands in the way of the development of her full potential and that of the children for whom she is responsible.
